Alpha Xi Delta photos stolen

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Alpha Xi Delta reported the theft of the sorority composite from its residence to the Riley County Police Department, Lt. Michael Quintanar of the RCPD said.

This is the sixth time the composite, or photo collection of current members, has been taken this year, Quintanar said.

The composite is valued at $2,500 and disappeared sometime between 1 a.m. and 2 p.m. Tuesday.

"We consider that a theft," Scott Jones, director of Greek Affairs, said.

Jones said he wasn't sure why the composite was stolen, but it had been damaged in a previous theft.

He said theft of composites is not out of the ordinary, and they are normally returned.

Ashley Renz, senior in management and Alpha Xi Delta president, declined to comment on the theft.

All-in-one cell phones replace students' many electronic gadgets

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student 1: That was close, I was almost late for class, but luckily I set two different alarms on my cell phone.
Student 2: Did you get my message on Facebook?
Student 1: Yeah, I just checked it on my cell phone.
Student 2: Are you listening to that new Christina Aguilera song?
Student 1: Yeah, I just downloaded it to my cell phone – I have all kinds of music on it.
Student 2: What time is it?
Student 1: My cell phone says its 9:29 a.m. Oh, look at the picture I took on my phone of my new kitten.

The time is approaching when the capabilities of almost any small electronic device can all fit in the palm of a hand.

Cell phones have taken the place of many of the everyday accessories and electronic devices that were once commonplace for all students and much of the population.

Alarm clocks, watches, cameras, MP3 players and, in some situations, computers now can all be found on one cell phone.

"It's easy to have just one device for all of these things. I don't have to bring my camera to the bars or worry about an alarm clock," Heather Hilgenkamp, senior in marketing, said.

Cell phones recently have become so technologically advanced they can replace nearly any electronic device. They can be personal digital assistants, MP3 players, alarm clocks, watches, mini-computers and an assortment of other appliances.

Ryan Evans, junior in computer science, recently bought a cell phone that also serves as a personal digital assistant. It cost $300, but it has all of the capabilities of a PDA, which includes Internet access and many of the features of a computer; MP3-playing ability; and all the features normally on a cell phone.

"It helps me keep track of things I need to do, like homework, and I also can use it as an MP3 player as I walk to class," Evans said.

With the seemingly perpetual increase of cell phone technology, many traditional companies are forced to take alternative routes to sustain sales.

Beauty college celebrates 50 years of consistent teaching

By Megan Molitor
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Crum's Beauty College celebrated its 50th anniversary Wednesday by offering haircuts for 65 cents – the same price they were in 1956.

Owner and founder Lucille Crum said hairstyles have changed considerably, but the teaching methods have remained the same.

When Crum founded the beauty college in 1956, she said she was not immediately welcomed in Manhattan.

"The building I was going to use was owned by a man who went bankrupt, so I took out a loan to buy it," Crum said. "But the Chamber of Commerce was against me starting the business, because I was a woman. In the end, though, they changed their minds."

Crum said she had owned her own shop before starting the school but gave it up to tend to her new business.

"The building the college was originally housed in was an old men's clothing store," Crum said. "Then, as the college grew, we moved across the street into a building that was an old grocery store. After that, we never had a problem, we just buzzed through."

The college never would have taken off without a little luck and the help of her employees, said Crum.

"We were very lucky to have good help. I could never have done it alone," she said.

Crum's Beauty College was accredited as a charter member of the National Crediting Commission for Cosmetology Arts and Sciences in 1969 and began with only 15 students, the minimum by Kansas law.

"After a few years, we were up to 90 students," Crum said. "We were the second school in Kansas to be recognized as a Pivot Point school in 1976."

Crum said the college had events like style shows to draw customers.

Wida Egan, instructor since 1993, said three original graduates of the college came and spoke to the students on Monday, sharing memories and answering questions as part of the anniversary celebration.

"They explained the difference between how we cut hair now and how they did it back then," Egan said. "A perm back then cost $4, and now it costs that much just to buy the products."

Controversial play educates, shocks record crowd

Miles Ellington Gregley talks about some of the advantages he would receive if he chose to use the race card in his daily life. The trio of NWC discussed stereotypes people place on different races in society.

By Jonas Hogg
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The controversial play "N*gger, Wetb*ck, Ch*nk" has been performed from Los Angeles to Boston, but last night was its largest performance ever.

Elementary-school students to retirees filed into McCain Auditorium, and at the end of the night, the crowd totaled 1,439, which surpassed the group's previous largest performance by 250, Steven Seagle, cowriter of the show, said.

The show wasted no time in smacking the audience in the face with its eye-grabbing title. In the opening sequence the three characters, Allan Axibal, CH*NK; Miles Gregley, N*GGER; and Raphael Agustin, WETB*CK, created a beat using nothing but the three terms: "chink, wetback, nigger."

Many members of the audience heard of the play through word of mouth and were excited to see the show.

"(It's) risky, but you can definitely tell they're going to prove a point," Deborah Muhwezi, sophomore in mass communications, said.

From the start, "N*gger, Wetb*ck, Ch*nk" took the audience on a wild ride, from laughter, to sympathy, to tense moments, as it stomped through a subject that many approach only on tip-toe.

Contained within the play are humorous sketches about stereotypes, poetic moments about culture, and each actor's personal description of when race first became an issue.

"When you're 8 or 9, I don't think you know how to hate who you are," said Axibal of when he first heard "chink" used in reference to himself, "but you can definitely learn."

In addition, there was a sketch that dealt with using race to obtain an unfair advantage in some circumstances.

"The race card – sometimes good, sometimes bad – but one thing's for sure: you can't leave home without it," they said in unison.

"I loved it," said Rachel Osterhaus, freshman in early childhood education. "It was funny, and it also had a good message."

Joel Pearson, graduate student in student development, said the play is a good step in the right direction for everyone and even minorities can become hemmed in concerning stereotypes of other people.

"It gets the message started, but more has to be done," he said.

Toddler Fair mixes kids' games with information

Vendors, organizations gather for parents of young children

By Megan Moser
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan Public Library looked more like a daycare than a scholarly institution Wednesday during its annual Toddler Fair.

The event drew local parents and their children with booths from businesses and organizations that cater to young children, including Bates Dance Studio, Gymnastics Plus, La Leche League, Kansas Children's Service League and Attachment Parenting.

Dozens of children played and made craft projects as their parents collected information.

Sixteen groups presented at the fair, which has been happening since 2000, Jennifer Adams, children's services manager, said.

"We had a lot of parents ask where they could find play groups and things," Adams said.

"It's a hard age group, before they get into school, so it helps the parents to have all of this information in one place."

Mitzi Frieling, Manhattan resident, came to the fair for the third year with her children, Kylie and Colton, both 3, and her friend Jeanne Schamburg, who brought her daughters, Claire, 2, and Laura, 5 months.

"We talked to an art class teacher and talked to the zoo about birthday parties," she said.

"We looked into library story time, which started (Tuesday). There's lots of hands-on stuff for the kids, too."

Damian Hilton, owner of Hilton Development, a motor skills program for children, brought a piece of climable play equipment that was a popular attraction among the young ones.

"Lots of playing and no injuries – yet," he said with a smile.

Hilton said he has come to the event for the second year in a row, because it is a place for parents to get information that might be hard to find otherwise.

Manhattan resident Ryan Likes and his son, Ira, 2, played with a set of foam blocks.

"I will stack them," Ira said.

Then he changed his mind and kicked the blocks down.

"I'm making a train," he said.

"I think this is great," Likes said. "Any time they can put the resources together in one place and make it accessible, it's a good thing."

Oxymoron

GRANT REICHERT

The Rally for Nonviolence took place Sept. 6. A huge fan of non-anything, this seemed as good a chance as any to resupply my waning stock of pens.

As usual for such events, somehow all my right-wing friends showed up spontaneously, just to gawk as if it were a car wreck parceled out in booth form. I advised them to open their minds, stop being so cynical and start jamming stuff into their pockets.

As I stocked up, Joe Carr, a pro-anti-American activist, performed a scrawny, white, sandal-wearing approximation of rap, titled "Global Intifada," for the crowd's musical delectation.

If you didn't know, "intifada" is foreign-languagish for "uprising," usually denoting the violent conflicts between Palestinians and Israelis.

Here, at a nonviolence rally, a place of peace, tolerance and free pens, the invited singer proceeded to glorify violence, to ask for more intifadas.

I was awestruck – it was as if Irony had given us His only son, to walk among us and spread His gospel that we might be saved.

I couldn't contain myself – I had to confront Carr. So, after he finished, I stomped up to him and asked, to his face, "How do you do it – how do you find so many words that rhyme with intifada?"

Hello muddah, hello fadduh, here I am on intifada?

Carr proceeded to answer, but I didn't catch it. I apologize, but journalism be damned; I lost myself in his neckbeard. That, I thought, is the mark of sincere Palestinian activism: the willingness to go native and grow a solidarity neckbeard as illustrious as that of a centaur extra from the Chronicles of Narnia.

Anyway, Carr invited me to a "Nonviolent Direct Action Workshop" he was teaching later. I declined, however, as learning how to disassemble and smuggle AK-47s through Israeli checkpoints wasn't on my to-do list.

Before I left, Carr gave me his Web site, www.lovinrevolution.org. There, not only does Carr proclaim "solidarity with the Iraqi resistance," he lyrically aids the cause with charming couplets like this from a compact disc he peddled at the rally: "I don't like death, seen it with my eyes/ But Iraqi freedom means Americans must die."

In a nonviolent way, I'm sure, like peaceful intifada. Later Carr helpfully raps that mothers with military sons should "convince them to quit or start writing their eulogy."

However, even more alarming, is whatever thought process led Carr to believe the obscenely unmelodious line, "Indigenous existence is resistance, this I discerned," should ever be included in any song other than fork-tongued hosannas to Beelzebub himself.

Why was a man who wishes Americans dead and who brutalizes the English language allowed to plead for more intifadas at a Nonviolence Rally?

They should rally to discuss that. I mean, as soon as these pens run out.

Panic attacks trigger fear, but patient must go on

LOLA SHRIMPLIN

I thought I was losing my mind.

I was in the Collegian newsroom, the phone was ringing off the hook, people were talking about stories and other things, and I felt like I was in the center of a tornado.

It was a typical day, but something was terribly wrong, and I was terrified. Something was going to happen. Something I couldn't control.

I wanted to curl up in a ball in the corner of the room and shut everything out until my heart stopped feeling like it was pounding out of my chest, until I stopped feeling like I was going to throw up.

Until I stopped the terror that was making me want to run as far and as fast as I could, even though my heart was telling me I had run for miles.

This started happening a while ago, but just this year I went to Lafene Health Center and told a doctor I thought my medication for bipolar disorder was affecting me badly. I was shaking, and it felt like my heart was beating rapidly.

The doctor at Lafene cut my medication in half and said to see the doctor at Pawnee Mental Health in a week. I had three panic attacks in the following week, the last of which lasted for more than three hours – the one in the newsroom.

When I went to Pawnee, the doctor put the Prozac back to the level it was at before and increased the amount of Abilify I take.

I got the first night's sleep I have had in almost two months Monday night. For the first time, I slept through the whole night.

I can feel the fear now, as I write. It's almost a continuous thing – what the National Institute of Mental Health calls panic disorder and what I thought was just part of being bipolar. It was only when I was standing in the middle of the newsroom that I realized what was happening.

I felt so stupid.

Some people say they feel like they're having a heart attack. Some have shortness of breath or dizziness.

Personally, my heart feels like I have run a thousand miles; I feel sick to my stomach, and I can't focus on anything around me. But in all of that is the all-pervasive fear and the sense of doom and loss of control the NIMH Web site talks about.

No matter how many people at Pawnee tell me it's not a sign of weakness, I still feel like a failure. Being afraid of absolutely nothing, waking up in the middle of the night terrified for no reason – it seems pathetic, and I should be able to stop it.

If I heard about someone with this disorder, I wouldn't think he was weak. I wouldn't think he was a failure.

But we tend to be hardest on ourselves, and I wonder how many people feel the way I do.

It hurts like hell when I have a panic attack, and some people believe they are dying. I feel like I'm losing my mind. No matter how much I tell myself there's nothing to fear, no matter how I try to rationalize my fear and override it, it's still there.

And I have to go on. I can't stop or let it get the best of me. I love what I do for a living, and this is jeopardizing that.

So I take the Prozac and Abilify daily. I exercise as much as I can, to ward off the attacks.

And I try not to hate myself for being weak enough to be afraid of nothing.

Last night, the Manhattan Public Library demonstrated HomeworkKansas.org, the free online tutoring service for 4th- through 12th-grade students created to help students with homework.

This after-school program is an excellent way to help students and parents tackle the increasing content delivered in elementary and secondary education curriculums.

Students whose parents have never been to college are less likely to go themselves. According to a study by the National Center for Education Statistics, "first generation students are at a disadvantage throughout their time at colleges and universities. They enter without as much preparation; they get lower grades, and they are more likely to drop out."

One possible reason is that parents with only a high school education might have trouble helping their children with everyday homework assignments. The push for achievement in the classroom has led to a curriculum far more rigorous than generations before have been taught.

OK, freshmen, you've been at college for almost a month now. It's time you learned that you need to stop wearing jean shorts. Thank you.

No. 24-ranked K-State loses to Baylor

By Jeffrey Rake
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The No. 24-ranked K-State women's volleyball team struggled in its Big 12 Conference opener against Baylor, losing 3-1 (24-30, 30-28, 30-22, 30-25) Wednesday night at the Ferrell Center in Waco, Texas.

The loss was just the Wildcats' third in the last 13 meetings with Baylor, snapping a five-game winning streak against the Bears.

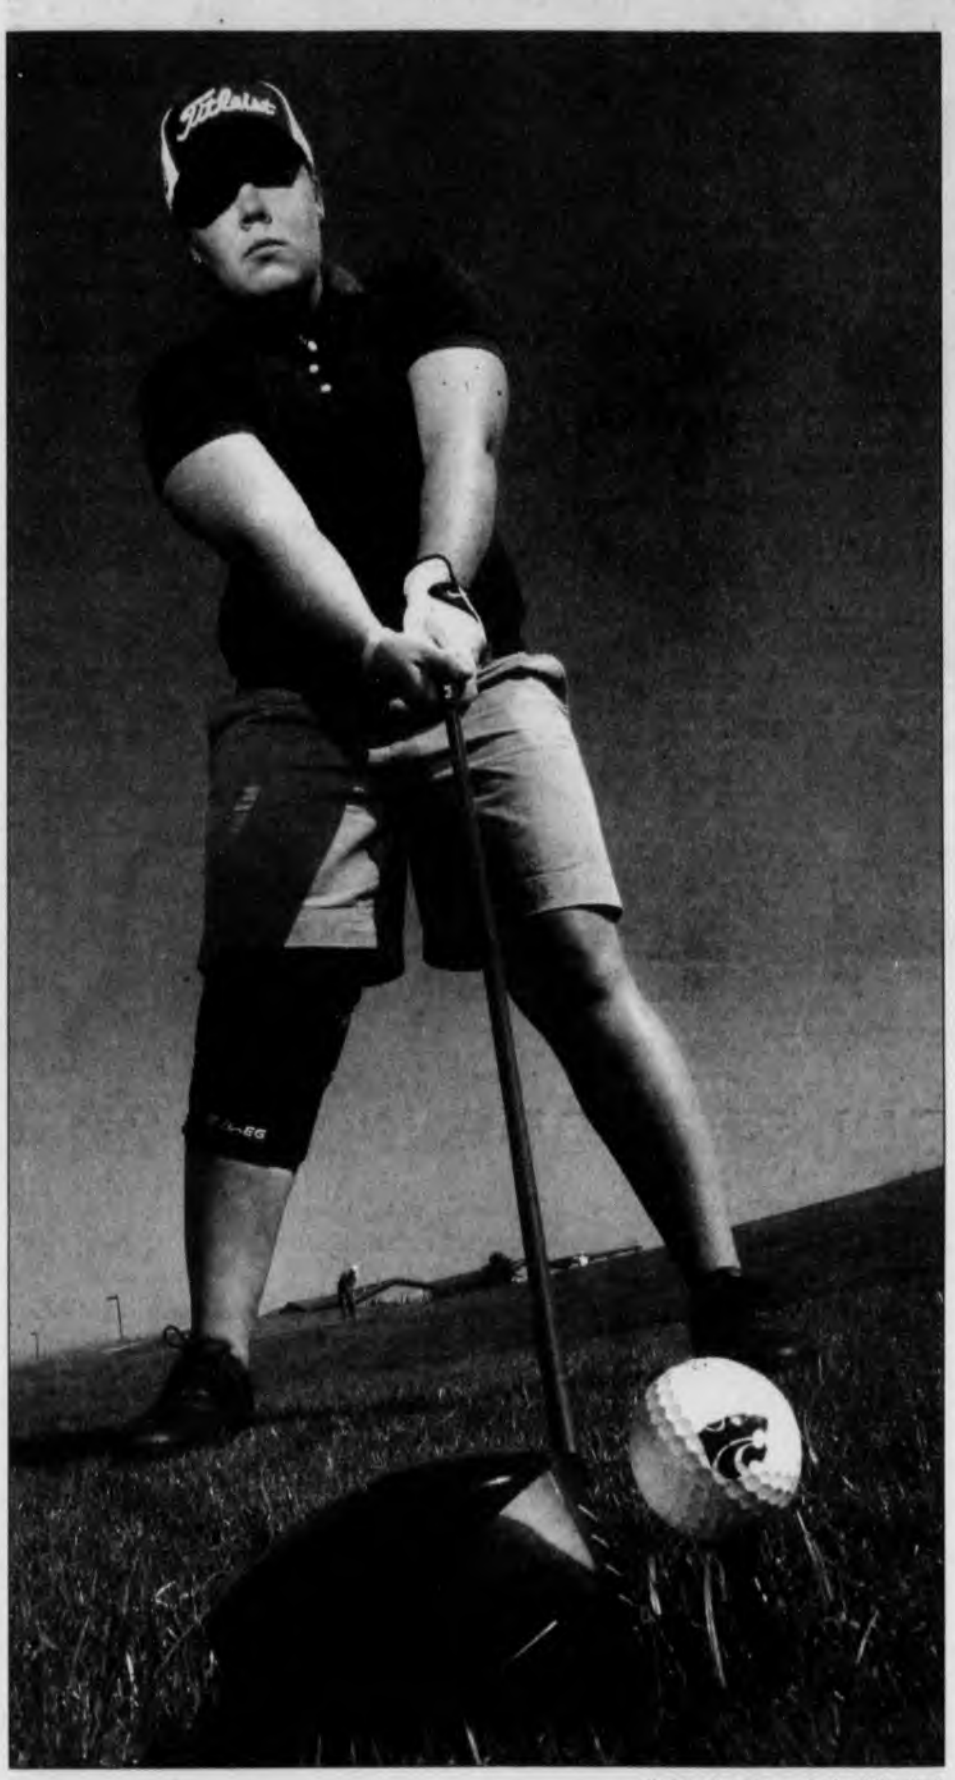
The Wildcats (8-3, 0-1 Big 12) got off to slow starts throughout the match, falling behind in each game. They were able to come back in game one, erasing a 10-7 deficit to take the game 30-24.

But playing from behind caught up with the Wildcats, as they dropped the next three games.

Baylor freshman Taylor Barnes posted a triple-double in her first Big 12 match. She finished the match with 11 kills, 52 assists and 15 digs.

Barnes paced a Baylor attack that put constant pressure on the Wildcats, whose hitting percentage was less than 25 percent in three of the four games.

Despite the loss, the Wildcats saw a solid effort from senior Sandy Werner, who recorded 18 kills and four digs. Redshirt freshman Tiffany Johnson chipped in with 12 kills and a .360 hitting percentage, while junior libero Angie Lastra had 25 digs.



Lastra entered the game in fifth place on K-State's all-time digs list and passed Shawnee Call (1,174) in what became her 16th career 20-dig match.

Players and coaches were unavailable for comment after the match.

The Wildcats will next play No. 17-ranked Missouri Sept. 20 at home.

Regan recovers from injury, starts season with success

Christopher Hanewinckel | COLLEGIAN
Michelle Regan finished fourth at the Badger Invitational this past weekend. Regan qualified for the U.S. Women's Amateur in August but didn't make the cut after two rounds.

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As day one of the Badger Invitational ended on Sunday, junior Michelle Regan was sitting in first place. Just seven months earlier, she was sitting on the sidelines.

"It was hard to fall asleep that night (going into the last round)," she said. "It was the first time I had been in that situation in college. I just had to play as well as I could. It was definitely a learning experience."

Regan's journey to finishing in the top five has been difficult. In January, she was sidelined with a ligament injury.

She had to miss the Central District Invitational February 20-21 and the Texas A&M Mo'Morial March 10-12. At the Central District, K-State finished in 13th place, and at the Mo'Morial, the Wildcats finished 12th. Before Regan's injury, the team's worst finish was a tie for ninth place at the 2005 Badger Invitational.

She was back in time for the Dr. Donnis Thompson Invitational March 21-22 in Kaneohe, Hawaii.

"My number-one goal was to work as hard as I could and get back as soon as possible," she said. "I reached my goal to be back at the lowest amount of time off."

Coach Kristi Knight said the injury was eye-opening for Regan.

"It's a message to her to slow down and be careful," she said. "Gradually in rehab, she worked her way a week ahead of schedule. It hasn't affected her game."

Regan, a 2004 graduate of Bishop Miege High School in Prairie Village, Kan., was a four-sport athlete, but golf was not her primary focus during the spring, because she played softball.

"When I came to college, that's when I really started to focus on golf," she said.

Knight never had Regan on her radar when she was recruiting players. After receiving a letter with a newspaper clipping from Bob Krause, chief student affairs officer for K-State, Knight offered Regan a golf scholarship.

In August, Regan qualified for the U.S. Women's Amateur at Pumpkin Ridge Golf Club in North Plains, Ore. Through two rounds, she scored a 20-over-par 162, which put her in 127th place, short of the cut.

"The Amateur was an awesome experience," she said. "It's an honor to qualify in the first place."

Regan is described as fun-loving and energetic, Knight said.

"She's someone who's a bit of a cheerleader for the team," she said. "If it's a golf course that runs side-by-side or if a teammate is in earshot, she'll cheer them on. She's got a lot of energy. She's also got an awful lot of talent. She's come right out of the gate this year and showed that."

Knight said she's anticipating seeing Regan compete more.

"With every tournament and experience, she continues to get better," she said. "I'm excited to watch her continue to develop. She knows she can play good golf, and she's looking forward to that."

CEDRIQUE FLEMMING

With less than a month until the end of Major League Baseball's regular season, I have started wondering who this year's American League's Most Valuable Player will be.

That topic has seemed to cause a lot of controversy over the past two years, with most of the hype coming from the Northeastern part of the country.

Last season it came down to Boston Red Sox designated hitter David Ortiz and New York Yankees third baseman Alex Rodriguez.

The hype surrounding the honor was based on the fact that a lot of baseball analysts said designated hitters are not as deserving of the award, because they do not play in the field. Yet Ortiz had to be considered because of his clutch hitting, his 47 home runs and 147 runs batted in. The debate more than likely caused a slight slant in the voting, allowing A-Rod to barely win the award with his 48 homers and 130 RBI.

Again Ortiz is part of the MVP talks this year, thanks in large part to his output of a career-high 48 home runs and 127 RBI, which are both leading the AL as of press time.

There is a new Yankee being considered alongside Big Papi though, and his name is Derek Jeter. The long-time Yankee shortstop and captain is the one many consider to be the favorite for the MVP.

He has a batting average of .346 this season to go along with his 13 homers, 92 RBI and 29 stolen bases. His batting average is second only to Minnesota Twins catcher Joe Mauer.

That brings me to my next point. Let's talk about the Twins.

They hold the best record in baseball since June 8, having gone 59-26 over the 85-game stretch before Wednesday's game with the Oakland Athletics. They are one of the hottest teams in the league and, with a record of 85-59, are currently leading the race for the AL Wild Card. Also, the Twins sit only one and a half games behind the Detroit Tigers for the Central Division title.

MVP candidates

- David Ortiz, DH, BOS — .288 batting average, 103 runs scored, 48 home runs, 127 runs batted in, 1 stolen base.
- Derek Jeter, SS, NYY — .346, 99 R, 13 HR, 91 RBI, 29 SB
- Jermaine Dye, OF, CWS — .325, 93 R, 41 HR, 112 RBI, 7 SB
- Johan Santana, SP, MIN — 18 wins, 5 losses, 230 strikeouts, 212.2 innings pitched, 2.75 ERA, 0.98 WHIP

With all this being said, why haven't the analysts begun to give serious consideration to the best player on the most dangerous team in the league?

Only 11 pitchers have ever won the AL MVP since the advent of the award in 1931, but Twins ace starting pitcher Johan Santana is hands down the most valuable player of the American League.

He is the most dominant player in the league right now, and he is leading in almost every pitching category.

The lefty hurler ranks first in the AL in wins (18) and innings pitched (212.2), and his 230 strikeouts this season are 43 ahead of second-place Jeremy Bonderman of the Tigers.

Santana is currently fourth with his 2.75 earned run average, but the three pitchers ahead of him – teammate Francisco Liriano, Los Angeles Angels of Anaheim's Jered Weaver and Houston Astros' Roger Clemens – have all made only 15 or 16 starts this season compared to Santana's 31.

One of the most telling statistics is that the Twins are undefeated since the All-Star Break when Santana pitches (12-0) and undefeated the entire season when he starts at home (16-0). If that isn't domination, then I'm not sure what is.

Sure, Jeter and Ortiz are putting up nice numbers, and they will definitely be in the consideration, but Santana is simply blowing away the competition.

It would be a shame if he does not become only the second pitcher since 1987 to win the AL MVP award.

RUN | Mendez's win at K-State Invitational earns her award

Sophomore Liliani Mendez was named the Big 12 women's Co-Runner of the Week for cross country meets through Sept. 9. Sharing the honor with Mendez was Iowa State sophomore Lisa Koll.

Mendez, from Dorado, Puerto Rico, took home the women's title at the K-State Invitational on Sept. 8 at Warner Park in Manhattan. Scoring a 5K time of 17:58.80, this marked the first cross country win for Mendez as a Wildcat. Her time was 34 seconds faster than second-place runner, and freshman Wildcat, Lindsay Pierson.

The Wildcats will have this weekend off before heading to the Roy Griak Invitational in Minneapolis, Minn., on Sept. 23.

K-State junior Tim Reyer is one of 31 punters, including five from the Big 12 Conference, to be added to the 2006 Ray Guy Award Watch List, the Greater Augusta Sports Council announced.

Reyer, a native of Wamego, Kan., is averaging just under 40 yards on five kicks through two games and has not had one of his punts returned this season. As a sophomore, Reyer averaged 40.3 yards on 65 punts in 2005 with 18 of those being killed inside the opponent's 20-yard line.

An honorable mention All-Big 12 selection as a freshman, Reyer averaged 42.4 yards on 36 punts, which ranked second nationally among all freshman punters. The former walk-on boomed 10 punts over 50 yards, which included four of over 60 yards.

The Ray Guy award is presented to the nation's best collegiate punter as determined by a national selection committee made up of sports writers, college football coaches, sports information directors, former punters and members designated by the Greater Augusta Sports Council.

Among the statistics used to identify the Ray Guy Award winner are total yardage punted, number of times a punt is downed or kicked out of bounds inside the opponents 20-yard line, net average, average returned yardage and percentage of punts not returned. It is important for the award winner to display team leadership and self-discipline and to have a positive effect on the team's success.

CFB | Northern Colorado punter stabs teammate in kicking leg

GREELEY, Colo. — In a scenario reminiscent of Tonya Harding versus. Nancy Kerrigan, the backup punter at Northern Colorado has been accused of stabbing his rival in the leg — his kicking leg.

Mitch Cozad, a sophomore from Wheatland, Wyo., allegedly attacked Rafael Mendoza in a parking lot this week. Mendoza was treated and released at a Greeley hospital, but it wasn't clear when he would return. Cozad was arrested on a charge of second-degree assault and freed Wednesday on a $30,000 bond.

Mendoza, who was treated and released at a Greeley hospital, will miss Saturday's game at Texas State.

Cozad was suspended from the university and the team and was evicted from his dorm room, university officials said. He had no listed phone number in Greeley, and a phone message left at his Wyoming address was not immediately returned.

GIRLS OF K-STATE

2 Playmates sign their Big 12 photos

Mark Sibilla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Hundreds of fans stood in the sun Wednesday outside of Dara's Fastlane #1 with Playboy Magazines in hand to get a glimpse of and a signature from the two women chosen to represent K-State in the "Girls of the Big 12" issue of Playboy.

The 10-page nude pictorial has been a popular part of Playboy's history for the past 30 years, Theresa Hennessey, media contact for Playboy, said. The college issue is released every October, and Playboy last featured the "Girls of the Big 12" in its October 2002 issue, she said.

"The purpose of the college issue, as with all issues of Playboy, is to feature models who could be the girl-next-door and see a different side of her," Hennessey said.

"We try to feature girls who are very beautiful yet very approachable; these are the kinds of girls who could sit next to you in your math or English class."

This past spring, Playboy photographers sent ads and casting calls to the universities of the Big 12 in order to find women who embody the college look, Stefan Prelog, public relations executive for Playboy, said.

"About 100 girls applied to meet with the photogs," Prelog said. "They would meet the girls and take snapshots of them. They would then see which girls they liked and wanted to use for the pictorial."

The two women who represent K-State are Delaine Barnes, 2006 graduate in animal science and current nursing school student, Courtney Storm, former K-State student.

Storm said she auditioned for the shoot because she has always wanted to pose for Playboy. Barnes also listed the same reason for auditioning, but added that she posed because it was an issue of female empowerment.

"Plus, how many people get to say they're in Playboy or audition for Playboy and actually have a shot at it?" Barnes said.

Barnes and Storm said they were not allowed to choose the locations where the photo shoot took place, but each said they were happy with how the pictures turned out. Barnes was photographed inside a hotel room, which she said was "decked out like a dorm room." Storm's pictures were taken on a farm in Westmoreland, Kan.

"It's just north of Wamego, and it was absolutely beautiful," Storm said.

Storm said the photo shoot was professional. The photographers and staff made sure no one was around during the shoot, and because the farm is close to the highway, proper measures were taken to ensure her privacy, she said.

When Barnes saw herself for the first time in the magazine, she said it was strange and almost surreal. Storm echoed the sentiment.

"It's cool, but it's really different," Storm said. "It's different than looking at yourself in the mirror. I can look at the photo and start to pick apart little things about myself and my appearance."

Storm said posing for Playboy was an enjoyable experience.

Barnes agreed, saying,. "It was a once-in-a-lifetime experience, and it was really great. I hope I am able to do more modeling for Playboy."

Let go of insecurities to wake up from naked dreams carefree

I used to have this dream when I was younger.

In the dream, I would show up to my high school ready for class.

LAUREN ROHRER

Everything seemed normal until I had to get up and sharpen my pencil. Because when I would get up, I would realize I was wearing absolutely nothing more than an extremely red face.

The naked dream – it's safe to say that many of us have had it at one point or another. If it were to ever become a reality, I would say about 99 percent of us would effectively flip out, leave the country and set up shop somewhere in Guam where the shame of the naked experience wouldn't follow us.

But what about the other 1 percent?

What kind of people could seriously show up to school naked and be so deliriously confident that they truly do not care? What are these people doing that makes their brains function void of insecurities that plague the rest of us?

Apparently, they are posing for Playboy.

OK, maybe not all of them, but at least the portion of that 1 percent that happen to look really good naked.

Many people have issues with magazines like Playboy.

Not surprisingly, most of those people are women. Because girls, by nature, have a lot of insecurities. "Do I look fat in this?" "Does he like me?" "Why isn't he calling?" "Why are we asking the same insane questions over and over and over again?" All these are prime examples that females are insecure. (OK, maybe not the last one, that one was just for me, but seriously.)

So, after much thought, I have two guesses. One: some of us are disgusted and can't handle female nudity. I can respect that. But my other guess is a little closer to my own opinion. We're freaked out because these are girls (well, women really) our age. They are not millionaire celebrities. They've got us worked up now because they are students just like us. And as competitive as the dating scene already is, now we have to deal with Bunnies? Awesome.

But we can't view it like that. It's like a job skill, really. These girls look really good naked, so Playboy is an avenue for them. It doesn't make them bad people – it just makes them really attractive people. But that also doesn't mean Playboy is the only avenue for them. They could be president just as easily as me. (But that's just crazy, right?)

The point is, as insecure as we can be, we have to let it go. And consider the possibility that maybe the reason people get so uptight about things like this is because they too would really like to wake up from the naked dream as carefree as these girls.

Library demonstrates online tutoring service for grades 4-12

By Josh Rouse
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A new service is now available for students in grades 4-12 and pre-college students who are looking for help on their homework.

HomeworkKansas.org, an online service connecting students with tutors, is a resource children and parents can use at home. A public demonstration of the program took place Wednesday night at the Manhattan Public Library.

The program is accessible 4-11 p.m. daily, and the tutors are certified teachers, college professors and graduate students. The service is free with a Kansas Library Card PIN number.

"We had some children in here today at the demonstration, and it was really hard for them to leave when the hour was over, because they were really excited about getting help with their math problems," said Linda Knupp, assistant director of the Manhattan Public Library.

"We think it will be a real asset, because they can use it from the library, but also, if you're at home, and it's 10 o'clock at night, you can still log in if you have Internet access," she said. "We're really excited about it and really glad the state library added it as a service."

Fred Atchison, director of the Manhattan Public Library, said he was enthusiastic about the program and the effect it will have on children.

He said the program will be a great help not only to students, but also to parents and teachers.

"This is going to be a great program, because in this day and time, we have such a focus on achievement in our schools, so you have educators looking for every possible resource to help," Atchison said. "You've got parents that are busy.

"Kids are getting home, and it seems like there's more and more pressure for achievement, and having a resource like this, which is available from home, is going to greatly help those parents. It doesn't replace what teachers do; it doesn't replace what parents do; it supplements."

Gov. Kathleen Sebelius has expressed interest in the program. In a press release by Tutor.com, Sebelius said HomeworkKansas.org "helps level the playing field for students."

"It is a resource available in rural and urban areas, in libraries and at home, and can be accessed regardless of income," Sebelius said in the release.

"Young Kansans will have the assistance they need to excel in the classroom. Tools such as HomeworkKansas might open the door to higher education, better jobs and economic opportunity for our students."

Band performs in Bosco Plaza

By Jonas Hogg
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jon Baker, vocalist for the Chicago-based band Lindbergh, performs Wednesday afternoon in Bosco Student Plaza. The concert was sponsored by Union Program Council.

Catrina Rawson
COLLEGIAN

Band members, students and faculty soaked in the sun Wednesday afternoon while listening to Chicago-based band Lindbergh.

Lindbergh brought its self-described blend of guitar-driven Indie rock and alt-pop vocals to K-State as a part of a self-promoting music tour that will take it to several locales throughout the Midwest, according to the band's Myspace.com profile.

Courtney Hauser, special events co-chair for Union Program Council, said UPC receives a steady flow of e-mails from groups interested in playing for UPC functions.

Organizing the show, including the $800 sticker price the band charges, was an involved, but not overly difficult, task, said Hauser, junior in public relations and psychology.

"You just lay it all out," she said.

Onlookers ebbed and flowed during the performance, with some nesting in the shade for longer viewings while others listened on their way to and from the K-State Student Union.

"I actually like them."

Chris Plank, Lindbergh's guitarist, said the group has been on the road for about a week and has a series of shows to go before returning home.

One of the more difficult things in achieving musical recognition, Plank said, was creating a sound that stands out.

Next is making money. The band fetches between $800 to $1,500 per show.

"It's about an average price for a band trying to make a name," he said.

He said watches have now become more of a fashion accessory than a necessity for time awareness.

Hilgenkamp said cell phone features like the clock are more reliable than traditional accessories. Cell phone clocks are continually updated to a standardized time.

Hilgenkamp said several professors have used students' cell phones to keep an exact time. Sororities and fraternities also use cell phones in processes like recruitment to standardize a time.

There is no denying that cell phones have increased communication across the country, and with the heightened use of Internet on phones, students can do even more. They can check their e-mail, surf the Internet and even price text books through text messages.

Every year new features are introduced for cell phones.

This year, Verizon Wireless has taken a technological step forward with its release of the LG Chocolate phone. The chocolate is the first all-in-one music-centric cell phone. It uses memory sticks to hold as much as two gigabytes of memory, or about 1,000 songs.

"MP3 players are a hot-ticket item now, and we are hoping to provide something for people that absolutely love music," said Erica Sevilla, public relation manager for Verizon Wireless.

The phone has another feature that also might attract college students. The phone can include an application that will recognize songs when held up to the radio.

The LG Chocolate phone also includes a global positioning system program that can help users find their way around unfamiliar places.

Even though the MP3 capabilities of cell phones have improved recently, many students still prefer to use separate devices like Apple iPods.

Vanessa Grabitz, sophomore in political science, said the MP3 technology is currently not strong enough to compete with iPods. She said that although she is planning on buying a new phone with an MP3 player, she will still use her iPod for listening to music.

"The sound quality through a phone is just not as decent as it is through an iPod," Grabitz said. "In the future, though, I think some people could buy these type of phones because people are always looking for a way to save money."

Apple declined to comment on how it plans to compete with the new music-centric cell phones.

Grabitz said cell phones with multiple features will soon be commonplace.

"I think some people would eventually buy all-in-one phones," Grabitz said. "It's cost effective, and it is much easier to kill two – or more – birds with one stone."

'What's the Matter with Kansas?' author to give lecture Monday

By Alex Peak
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kansas native and "What's the Matter with Kansas?" author Thomas Frank will present "How Conservatives Won the Heart of America," as part of the Lou Douglas Lecture Series.

"He has been in the news a lot recently," Linda Teener, executive director of UFM, said. "We thought it might be a provocative speech."

She said his lecture is likely to touch on a lot of the issues in his book.

"I think he'll be talking a lot about why we vote the way we do, and our reasons for picking a particular candidate," Teener said.

Even if people don't agree with his thesis regarding Kansas politics, she said she hopes the presentation will open people's minds. The lecture series itself encourages audience members to think more broadly about their community, state and nation, she said.

"We hope it will raise thought for people and generate a lot of discussion," Teener said.

Teener said she hopes Frank's lecture will bring about a lot of talk during the presentation. She also said there will be a question-and-answer session.

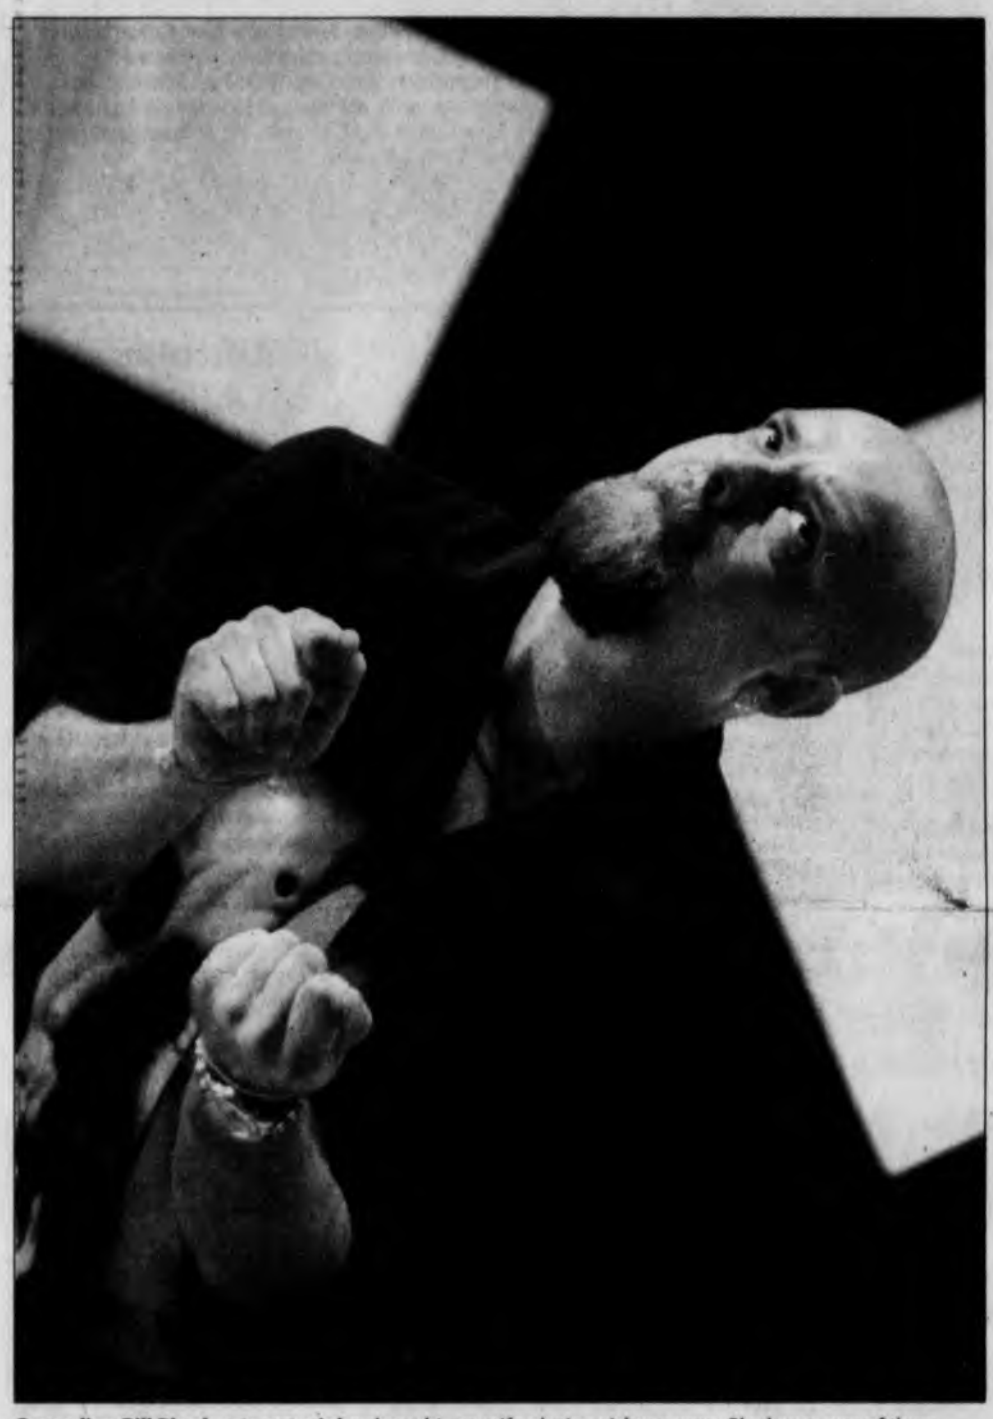
Lelah Dushkin, retired professor of sociology, said she is active with the Donald J. Adamchak Distinguished Lecture Series in Sociology, and helped bring Frank to K-State after she read his book.



So, what is the matter with Kansas?

"I think the people of Kansas would like to know," Dushkin said. "He might be a bit provocative, but I think his speech will get good discussions going."

The lecture will take place at 7 p.m. Monday in Forum Hall. A book signing will follow the lecture.

The presentation is sponsored by the Lou Douglas Lecture Series and the Donald J. Adamchak Distinguished Lecture Series in Sociology.

3 comedians take the stage, get laughs at Union

Comedian Bill Blank acts out a joke about his ex-wife playing video games. Blank was one of three comedians to perform as a part of UPC Awareness Week.

By Josh Rouse
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State Student Union Grand Ballroom erupted with laughter Thursday night as comedians Mike Cotayo, Bill Blank and Moody McCarthy thoroughly entertained the crowd.

Meghan Newman, senior in English literature and French, said she liked the show. She is on the Entertainment Committee for the Union Program Council, a sponsor of the show.

"I think it went over well," Newman said. "I think the people who came really enjoyed it. I know the comedians really wanted the audience to be filled, but it's difficult on a campus like this, but I think everyone who came really enjoyed it."

The comedians, who are part of the Comedy X Tour, told jokes about Wal-Mart, trailer parks and the inventor of the snooze button. Cotayo, who opened the show after members of the audience told jokes of their own, said being a comedian has always been his dream.

"Comedy was always something I've wanted to do, ever since I was 12 years old," Cotayo said. "I loved stand-up; I loved watching stand-up."

Blank was next on stage. Blank, the star of SpikeTV's "Invasion Iowa," said he hopes the tour will be a hit.

"I think the tour itself is going to be a huge success," Blank said. "There's about six or seven other colleges out there doing shows right now with other comics. It's definitely going to be a success, because the guy who books it is a freakin' genius."

McCarthy, show's headliner, appeared last. He gave advice to people who are interested in making comedy a career.

"I'd say, just get on stage," McCarthy said. "It's a job where there almost is no advice other than just get on stage, because everything you'll learn will happen on stage. Pick a good opening joke, don't take things personally, and learn from your mistakes."

Maddys inform students through radio show

By Parker Rome
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Politicians are often criticized for not fulfilling all of their campaign promises after being elected.

Only a few weeks into their first semester, Student Body President Lucas Maddy and Vice President Katie Maddy already are a third of the way done with their campaign promises.

Last spring, when the Maddys ran for office, they based their campaign platform on three C's: campus, community and career.

"It is a way for us to update students, and it's a venue for students to access elected officials," said Lucas, senior in agricultural economics and agricultural technology management.

The hour-long show features the Maddys discussing upcoming SGA activity and responding to on-air phone calls and e-mails. It will feature university faculty members and student leaders. Lucas said the show is light-hearted but designed for a purpose.

"The whole idea is to be proactive instead of reactive," Lucas said.

The Maddys said they want the show to be a way for the community to get involved with Student Governing Association and to learn about issues before they are resolved.

"We don't want issues to pass or fail without people knowing," said Katie, senior in animal science and industry.

While the first show didn't include on-air phone calls, upcoming shows will allow listeners to call in to give instant feedback. Students also can e-mail Lucas or Katie, and their issues will be brought up on the show.

"We are looking at profiling someone, like a student senator or a K-State official, each week," Lucas said.

Keeping with the light-hearted nature of the show, the profile will showcase more than just what could be read on a résumé, Lucas said. Guests might include student sena-

Constitution Day to teach history

By Alex Peak
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students, faculty and community members will be able to learn more about the U.S. Constitution, democracy and judicial processes at the second-annual Constitution Day.

Events for the day include judicial hearings, panel discussions, games and several displays.

All federal institutions that receive funding must present a program that recognizes Constitution Day.

"The Constitution is the foundation of our democracy. The more we know and think about it, the better," Cochran said.

Jackie Butler, assistant university attorney, helped with arrangements for the three judges who will attend.

She said it's important for students to be knowledgeable about the Constitution, because it's central to U.S. history.

Constitution Day events will take place from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. Monday in the K-State Student Union. In Forum Hall, the hearings will be 10-11:30 a.m., and a panel discussion on judicial review and constitutional democracy will be 1:30-3 p.m.

Facebook CEO explains changes to college journalists

Staff Reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Facebook.com founder and CEO Mark Zuckerberg and co-founder and spokesperson Chris Hughes participated in an online conference Thursday. They discussed Facebook's recent and unpopular presentation changes, user statistics and business deals.

This online interview drew representatives from more than 70 university newspapers. The host Web site was cpnewslink.com.

Q: Why News Feed and Mini-Feed?
Zuckerberg: For a lot of reasons. The feed products make sense as the next evolution of Facebook. People generally use Facebook to get a sense of what's going on with the people around them and understand their world a little better.

Up until this last week people had to browse around the site and read through people's profiles to get a sense of all this, but with these new products we can surface a lot of that information for people. It makes using Facebook a lot more efficient for seeing what's going on around you.

Q: Has there been a decline in membership since the News Feed and Mini-Feed features have been added?
Hughes: No, not at all. We've actually seen an uptake in usage and new users.

Q: People at Penn State feel that the news feed was too much. I understand you adjusted the privacy settings, but why offer so much information at all? Shouldn't privacy be offered before the information is released instead of after?
Zuckerberg: Some people have said they think the feeds are too much, but I think they just surface information that was already there in an easier way.

Over the past week, we've received a lot of feedback from people that they learned things about their friends they would have otherwise missed, and since their friends put that information up for them to see, that seems like a good thing to me.

I do agree with you about the privacy settings, though. We messed that up. We definitely should have given more granular controls before launching anything.

We're still working on fixing this. The other night we added the ability to remove mini-feed from your limited profile, for example.

We'll probably add more as we have time.

Q: What was your first reaction when you first learned of the strong response?

It was interesting to see people organize through global groups on the site, though, and to see the groups spread through News Feed. It was nice to see people use the tools we supplied to create a forum and have an open discussion about these things.

Q: Many students are wanting the "old" Facebook back – sort of the original look and feel. Is that something you're willing to risk?
Hughes: The feed features are pretty integral to the development of the site, so we won't be removing them. (The vast majority of your users aren't telling us they want them gone.) Instead, people told us they wanted more control over them, so that's what we've looked to give them.

Q: I know the numbers are growing rapidly, but what is the estimated number of Facebook users?
Hughes: We have over 9.5 million users and (are) the seventh-most trafficked site on the Internet.

Q: Will you ever "find something to put here?"
Hughes: Ha ha. I don't know. We'll see.

Talking points

Democrats employ facts as tools in these mid-term elections, but Republicans never need facts

OWEN KENNEDY

With fewer than 60 days until the mid-term elections, both parties are looking for more ways to retain or gain power. These elections aren't about hundreds of individual races for Congress. No, these are about what talking points each party can lay out for its candidates.

The Republicans have their typical patriotic, mega-American agenda: more spending, more disregard for the environment, and making sure gays don't destroy America.

The Democrats have their usual al-Qaeda-like talking points: health care for all Americans, decent wages for every worker, and fighting terrorists where terrorists actually are.

If the latter party isn't a bunch of terrorists, I don't know what is.

However, the big election tool this season seems to be the war in Iraq. (Oh, I'm sorry, the "War on Terror," the frontline of which is in Iraq. Really. I swear.)

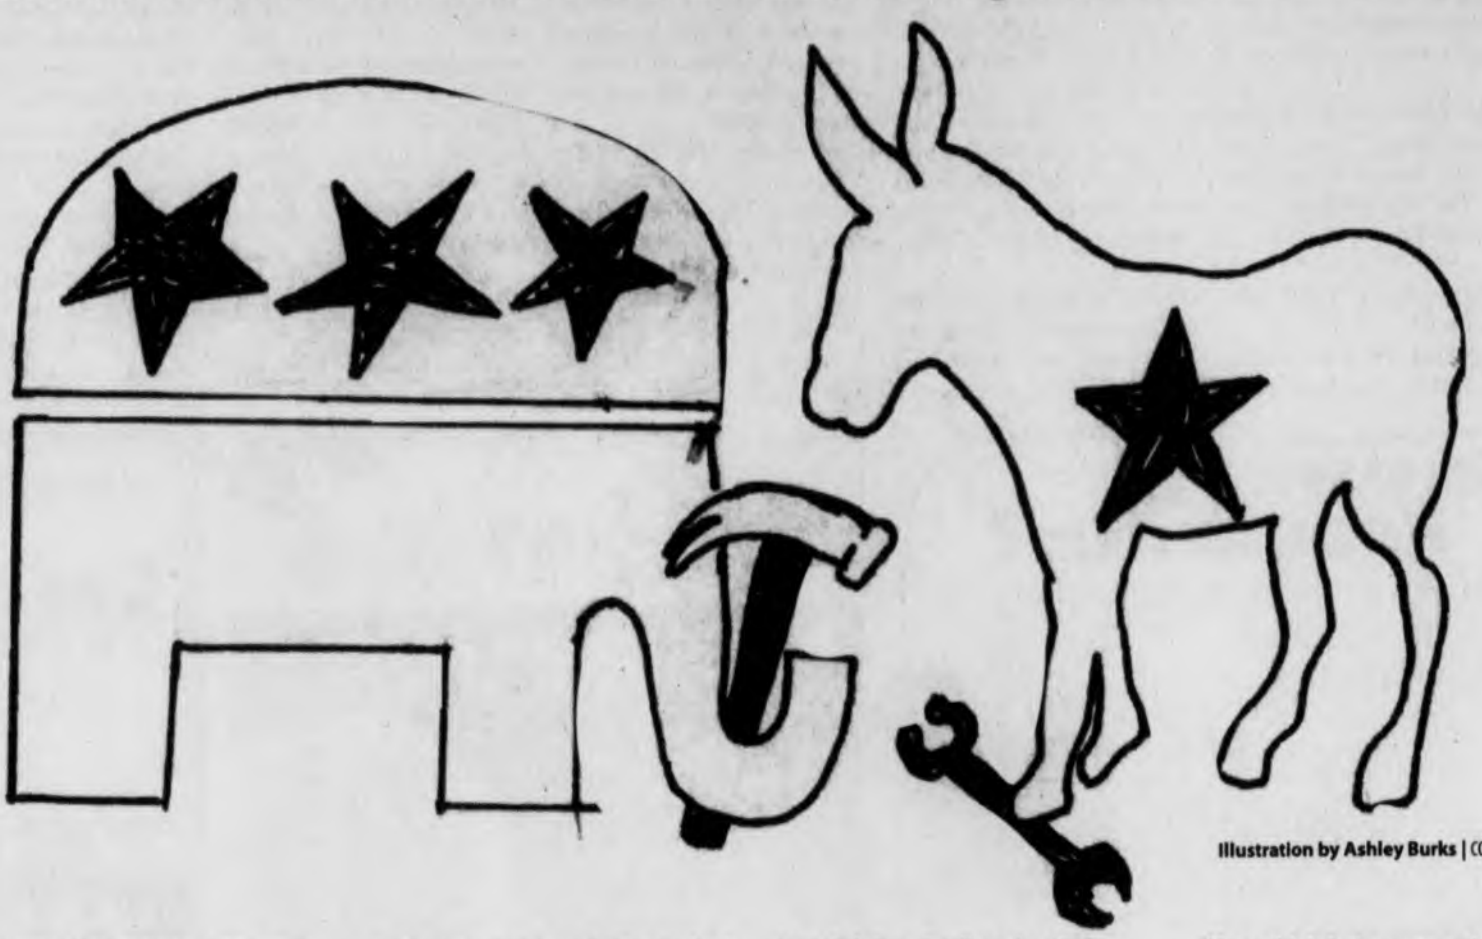

Illustration by Ashley Burks | COLLEGIAN

Democrats have been up in arms in recent days over a Senate report that found no evidence whatsoever that al-Qaeda and Saddam Hussein had ties to one another. The party of blue is saying this proves it was right all along – Iraq wasn't the next step, after Afghanistan, in the war on terrorism.

Sen. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, accused Democrats of making a touting something they already suspected.

"The additional views of the committee's Democrats are little more than a rehashing of the same unfounded allegations they've used for over three years," Roberts said, according to Reuters.

This information is totally unfounded, as Roberts said. Show me one document that says the Democrats were right to believe Saddam and al-Qaeda had no ties – besides the one the Senate just released.

Progressives are trying to use this as a way to gain power in November. That's just like the Democrats. Using "information" and "factual evidence" to get elected. Why can't they be good Americans like the Republicans and use real campaign tools, like gay-bashing and fear-mongering?

Only a party led by Howard Dean would try to convince Americans to elect its members by using "facts." The president didn't need the F-word to convince America Iraq was a threat, so why abandon something that works?

The fact-lovers on the left would tell you the Marines' chief intelligence officer in Iraq reported the most pessimistic view in al-Anbar province in Iraq since the invasion.

According to the Washington Post, Col. Pete Devlin's classified assessment offers a dim look into the country's biggest province and says there is almost nothing U.S. forces can do to secure it.

What are the lefties going to say next? That the facts show President Bush actually was born in Connecticut and not Texas?

Next they'll tell you John Kerry served his country in Vietnam, as did John Murtha. But good Americans know that true patriots serve in the Alabama Air National Guard, protecting our shores from the Viet Cong.

If you think facts are a good thing, go ahead and vote Democrat in November and let the terrorists win. But if you think facts hate America, be a patriot and vote Republican.

Iraq is full of sand, so let's ship some of that grainy gold to the U.S.A. and keep burying our heads in it. That way we can keep the Republicans in power. It will be more fun than sarcasm.

Technology hinders communication

BECKY STEINERT

One-sided conversations occur every day.

When stepping outside, I can't help but notice how talkative people can be when they appear to be completely alone.

Upon closer inspection, I often realize they are in fact talking not to thin air, but rather to an inanimate object held to the ear. Realizing that my witty, enlightening remarks are not welcome to such people, I move on.

However, I often move on to pick up my own phone and tell my witty, enlightening remarks to someone who will appreciate them.

Technology has done a lot for us, but it has worked against us as well. One such negative aspect is how we now block out our tangible surroundings in favor of a digital paradise, like the cell phone use I described.

Face-to-face conversations often are abandoned, because a call heralded by a beeping version of the Pussycat Dolls' "Buttons" takes precedence. Liberal cell phone usage is another way of clearly saying, "no one within my line of vision is interesting enough for me to talk to."

Equally unfriendly are the people who walk around campus with iPods, particularly those who choose to pair them with a baseball cap and a pair of sunglasses. To these people: we get it. We won't talk to you.

Impatience has been conditioned into all of us as a result of this technological revolution. If Facebook takes more than three seconds to load, obscenities are shouted, and lives are threatened. We deserve better, don't we? My heart breaks each time I hear someone say: "Expletive! My personal computer is taking slightly longer than the speed of sound to load this frivolous Web site!"

I think we all die a little inside at the thought. However, this sense of entitlement goes hand in hand with the impatience we have developed.

It all comes down to less work for humans. Technology is good because it allows us all to get more done in less time, but it is bad because, in reality, it allows us to be lazy bums.

Gone are the days of having to read a book for English class. Today, your summary of "The Great Gatsby" is as good as written for you by any number of Web sites.

Yes, I would say that technology overall has a massive net gain. I marvel at the wonders of it, like how my voice can somehow reach someone hundreds of miles away.

I'm probably just behind the times, but I can't help but think about the unequal parallel between technological and societal advancements.

Permanent, temporary Kansas residents should hear 'what's the matter' with state

When one man comes to town with information as to "What's the Matter With Kansas," it seems natural that we should want to attend to discover our malady.

Our opportunity will arrive this Monday when Thomas Frank presents a joint Lou Douglas and Donald J. Adamchak lecture titled "How Conservatives Won the Heart of America."

Thomas Frank is alternately praised and derided for his book, "What's the Matter with Kansas," but students, faculty and Manhattan residents should seize this opportunity to hear the words straight from him.

In times when the most arguments are rephrasings of Limbaugh, Franken, Coulter and Moore, it's refreshing to hear new opinions.

For those who disagree with Frank's opinions, Monday night's lecture is an opportunity to question the man directly. And for those who support the stance set forth in Frank's books, the lecture is a chance to challenge and or strengthen your own beliefs.

After all, as residents of Frank's native state, we should be present to reaffirm that even if there might be something wrong with the lot of us, we're still willing to talk about it.

Did I say grass? I meant pot.

Why is gas in Topeka $2.25, gas in Ogden $2.19, but gas in Manhattan is still $2.45? Oh yeah, there's a home football game this weekend.

Did the Dream Police inspire Cheap Trick, or did Bun E. Carlos quit smoking?

Collegian does employ copy editors

In case you haven't heard, the Sept. 1 issue of the Collegian came out rather messed up.

LOGAN C. ADAMS

It was embarrassing for us, but the incredible number of grammatical errors in the paper two weeks ago was not from a human mistake. It takes a machine to screw up that much.

Collegian editor in chief Emily Lawrence said the paper looked great when it was sent as a digital file through the Internet to be printed by the Salina Journal, the newspaper that prints every Collegian. Sometime after that, she said, something caused a glitch in the files that played a game of musical chairs with our words.

The people in Salina check for visual problems, Lawrence said, but do not read the text, or copy, as we call it. This allowed the weird words to skate through unnoticed, until after the papers already had been distributed.

It didn't help that the paper was finished more than two hours past deadline that night, Lawrence added. She said she didn't leave the newsroom until 5:30 a.m., only to be awakened at 9 a.m. by a call about the errors.

Lawrence told me a few calls were placed to other student newspaper advisers, and it was discovered that other newspapers using the same software have had similar problems. The Collegian is designed with Adobe InDesign Creative Suite 2, a fairly new program that contains its share of bugs, Lawrence said.

The thing that gets me, though, is how students responded to the problem. Upon seeing the bizarre repetition of certain errors, many made implications that there wasn't anyone proofreading the paper.

Copy chief Abby Brownback, who is responsible for the grammar, style and accuracy of the Collegian's words, said she was unhappy when she learned she allegedly does not exist.

I didn't like the possibility that I might have imagined a colleague, so I set out to prove Brownback is real. It was not easy.

The Collegian Copy Chain

Each story is read and checked for errors by the following people in this order:

1. The editor of the desk for which the story was written.
2. News editor Leann Sulzen
3 & 4. Two afternoon copy editors
5. One evening copy editor
6. Copy chief Abby Brownback
7. Managing editor Kerry Fischer
8. Editor in chief Emily Lawrence.

First, I asked around the newsroom. Sports editor Anthony Mendoza told me there is indeed an Abby Brownback. This was good.

I then asked Rachel Jorgensen, junior in elementary education and our copy chief's best friend of six years, if Brownback is real while she visited us Wednesday night. She confirmed it as well, giving me two witnesses.

One could say my argument is flawed, as I might have imagined Mendoza and Jorgensen, along with Brownback. I don't think that's a problem, though, because that would mean I'm truly insane and likely not even writing this column.

I tried another test, the one René Descartes created when he declared, "I think, therefore I am."

So I asked Brownback if she thought tennis is good. She said yes.

Thus, Brownback thinks, and therefore she is. Thank goodness, because I certainly wouldn't want to have to do her job while she was off not existing.

Seriously, though, our copy staff – which exists, too – is a group of hardworking people who do their best daily to keep our words clean. It's a difficult and stressful job, going through an entire newspaper's worth of content, scrutinizing for every mistake each day, and I have no idea how they do it.

But I am willing to bet very few of their critics could do the job better.

Senate approves interns, allocations

By Megan Moser
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Senate approved the selection of 25 Senate interns and allocated funds to the Black Student Union and Sexual Health Awareness Peer Educators during its meeting Thursday night.

BSU was allocated $900 for travel to the University of Colorado to attend the 30th annual Big 12 Conference on Black Student Government Sept. 22-24.

SHAPE was allotted $650 to sponsor speaker David Coleman, "The Dating Doctor," on Sept. 19.

The Allocations Committee introduced legislation for funds to be given to the Japanese Yosakoi Dance Club and Apostolic Christian Church Youth Group for upcoming trips. Both measures were held for referral.

SafeRide coordinator John Bergin presented data from the first six nights of the program's operation this semester. He said the new pick-up station in Aggieville has improved overall efficiency.

The seven vans in operation have transported an total of 2,013 passengers in 757 trips during that time, for an average of 2.65 passengers per call, up from 1,651 passengers in 839 trips for an average of 2.0 passengers per call in fall 2005.

"We're getting students home in a more efficient manner, and I think that's something we all can appreciate," Bergin said.

Career and Employment Services director Kerri Day Keller reported on changes in Holton Hall. Aside from building renovations, she said CES programs, which have carried a user fee in previous years, are now free to students.

Keller said usage of similar programs at other schools doubled and tripled with the elimination of a user fee, and CES is well on its way to hitting its goal of 5,000 users by the end of the year.

"It's pretty ambitious," she said. "But we're well on our way."

TO THE EDITOR

Censorship of Fourum based on intelligence denies desires of readers who fund paper

Editor,

It's time someone addressed the changes to the Fourum and letter to the editor sections of the Collegian. The Collegian has gone too far in its reduction and censorship of the Fourum and letter to the editor.

The Collegian was originally created in 1896 by students with the goal of having a paper free of faculty control. The paper is meant for college students and should be responsive to those students' wishes or risk becoming totalitarian in nature. It seems students want the Fourum back.

The Fourum has been popular, and it doesn't make sense to reduce its size. One of the most basic marketing strategies is to give people what they want. If the Collegian wishes to retain its readers' interest, it would be wise to remember this. The Fourum is a place of free speech and should remain as such. I can understand censoring hateful, sexist, racist and other harmful statements, but censorship based on intelligence is absurd.

The Collegian editors claim students have abused the Fourum because our usage does not meet their standards of intelligent comments. As newspaper editors, they should be aware of the dangers censorship brings. Because we live in this country, we have the right to speak our minds, regardless of how stupid our comments might be.

Finally, the Collegian is funded through Student Governing Association by Student Privilege Fees. Since students cannot take business elsewhere, the Collegian should be responsive to our desires.

I challenge the Collegian staff to be aware of its audience when making decisions.

Actions, opinions of 1 radical don't represent entire party; respect fellow Americans' beliefs

Editor,

Opinions of one should not be seen as representative of many.

As a Democrat, I personally agree with the philosophy that peace cannot be maintained without war. Mankind has proven time and again that it is mentally and physically unable to talk intelligently about differences to uncover a solution. I've come to accept this fact in the hopes of maintaining peace at the lowest cost in terms of human life.

My largest concern with the article posted on Monday by columnist Chuck Armstrong, however, is the foolish association of the actions of Cindy Sheehan as representative of the entire Democratic Party. As an American Democrat, I, much like Republican counterparts, want to make this country the best that it can be. I understand that your opinions don't necessarily fall in line with mine, and I respect your opinion as a fellow American.

However, I resent your implication that since Cindy Sheehan has taken an extremely liberal stance, her ideas speak for me as a Democrat. I do think that diplomacy should be the first action and war the last, but you conclude, without base, that I, as a Democrat, agree that diplomacy should be our only weapon against those that disagree with U.S. foreign policy.

Next time, please don't be so short-sighted as to assume the actions of one liberal represent an entire political party.

Editor,

Most of this week's column was what I've come to expect from Grant Reichert – a lot of facetiousness and provocation with little substance – but I must say, I did like the headline a lot: "Encouraging violence to prevent violence gets you nowhere."

That pretty much sums up the American dilemma in Iraq. The Israelis could learn from it, too. Joe Carr doesn't impress me much either, but he's not nearly as dangerous as the people running our country right now, who apparently share Joe's belief in the righteousness of violence.

I'm glad Reichert is starting to see the error of his past ways. I look forward to reading more from him based on this new awareness of the futility of violence.

Record setter

Under par

Christopher Hanewinckel | COLLEGIAN

K-State sophomore golfer Robert Streb shot an eight-under par 64 on Aug. 23 at Colbert Hills Golf Course, breaking the previous course record of 66.

Shooting 8-under par 64 at Colbert Hills course puts sophomore golfer Robert Streb in the record books as beating previous low of 66

By Jeffrey Rake
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When K-State sophomore golfer Robert Streb was 2 years old, he would go to the local driving range and hit balls with plastic golf clubs.

At the time, nobody knew that swing eventually would be capable of tearing up even the toughest of golf courses, which is what it did Aug. 23 at Colbert Hills Golf Course.

Streb, a native of Edmond, Okla., recently shot an 8-under par 64 at Colbert Hills Golf Course, breaking the previous course record of 66.

In a round where everything seemed to go right – driving, chipping and putting – Streb was able to produce one of the prettiest scorecards you will ever see: seven birdies, an eagle and just one bogey.

Streb said he was swinging the club well before the round.

"Some days the swing feels pretty good, and some days it doesn't," he said. "It felt pretty good that day."

Streb birdied two of the first three holes in his round and made the nine-hole turn at 2-under par 34. He caught fire early in the backside, stringing together four straight birdies on holes 10 through 13.

He kept leaving himself makeable birdie putts and was able to convert on all of them. It was after that stretch of holes when thoughts began creeping into his head.

"I had a pretty good idea of the record at that time, and I started thinking about it," Streb said.

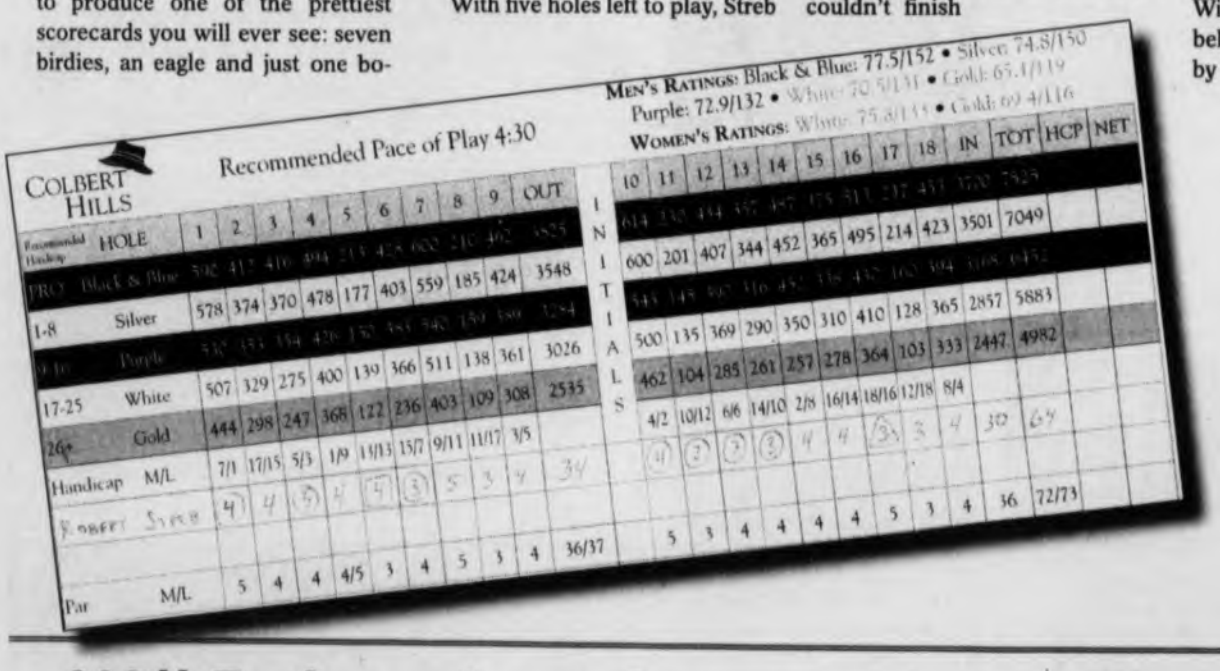
Instead, he made eagle.

On the 513-yard par-5 16th, Streb launched a driver down the fairway, setting himself up with a 4-iron into the green. He knew all he would have to do was hit his next shot near the green and card a four. But sometimes Streb likes to make things easy, and that is exactly what he did.

"I hit it to about three feet and tapped in for eagle," he said.



Streb parred the final two holes and walked off the 18th green a record holder. Streb said he and a former teammate, recent graduate Ben Kern, had been close to the record a number of times before, but couldn't finish the job.

"It was nice to just have it going and keep it going," he said. "It sure beats blowing it on some hole where you hit it in the weeds or something."

Now that Streb holds the record, he can spend time focusing on what is most important to him: accomplishing some of the team's goals.

"We just want to improve from last year and maybe have a shot at qualifying for nationals," Streb said. "That's the ultimate goal, just getting to the big show."

K-State continues play on Saturday in the Wolverine Intercollegiate in Ann Arbor, Mich. Last year in the two-day event, Streb finished with a 5-over par 218, and the Wildcats finished in fourth place, behind the tournament champion by 13 strokes.

GOLFER

Will Federer beat Sampras in number of titles?

With his defeat of Andy Roddick last weekend in the U.S. Open, Roger Federer won his ninth Grand Slam tennis singles event championship.

DAYNE LOGAN

In doing so, he moved into sixth place on the all-time Grand Slam winners list and now is just five wins short of Pete Sampras' record of 14.

By the way, Federer is 25 years old.

To put that into perspective, Andre Agassi, the face of American tennis and winner of eight career Grand Slam events, had only won three titles by the time he was Federer's age. The only player ever to record nine Grand Slam titles quicker than Federer was Sampras himself. Thus, the question begs to be asked: Will Federer catch Sampras? And if so, when?

All signs seem to point to yes. Federer is hotter than ever, winning nine of the last 14 Grand Slams, including three out of four this year. Additionally, Federer is virtually unbeatable on grass. He has won four straight titles at Wimbledon and is 48-0 on grass courts in the last four years.

He's not too bad on the hard court, either. In the past two years, the Swiss native has lost only three hard court matches. He has won three of the last four U.S. Opens and two of the last four Australian Opens. Both tournaments are played on hard courts.

Federer is beginning to dominate the sport of tennis, and he does not seem to have a rival in sight.

In this year's Association of Tennis Professionals rankings, Federer has the lead with 7,295 points. Rafael Nadal is next with 4,800 points, and Ivan Ljubicic is the only other player with more than 3,000 points. These numbers are hardly surprising to the avid tennis fan, given Federer's seemingly eternal reign atop the ATP rankings.

He has topped the rankings for 137 consecutive weeks, a feat that has been surpassed by only two men in professional tennis history – and no, Sampras is not one of them.

The only chink in Federer's armor seems to be matches played on clay courts – namely, the French Open. Federer has never won the French portion of the Grand Slam, and until he does, tennis critics will have reason to suggest his career is incomplete. Still, even if he never wins the French Open, he still will surpass Sampras.

Given Federer's recent dominance and the fact that his closest competitor, Nadal, can beat him only on clay, Federer could be atop the career Grand Slam titles list by his 28th birthday. After that, it's just a question of how high he will set the bar for the next challenger.

Where to watch the Wildcats this season

Purple Pig Report Card:
Atmosphere: A
Food selection: B
Drink (choices): B
Entertainment: A

With a friendly sports atmosphere and a variety of entertainment options, the Purple Pig is an ideal place to watch K-State this season.

The first thing that is apparent when entering the Purple Pig is that it is a bar that knows what city it's in. Unlike most bars that try to recreate a big-city atmosphere, the Purple Pig has used resources close at hand to create an establishment completely dedicated to K-State. The walls are covered with old K-State sports photos, and purple banners and athletic jerseys are strewn throughout.

The Purple Pig has a lot of entertainment options. There are seven big-screen televisions well-spaced throughout the restaurant, as well as seven smaller televisions. This ensures every seat in the room provides a good view of the game. Additionally, if you miss the game Saturday, the Purple Pig rebroadcasts the game throughout the day on Wednesdays.

In addition to the televisions, the Purple Pig has several alternative entertainment options. There are two touch-screen gaming systems, a Golden Tee golf game, two dart boards, a pool table and a jukebox.

The food selection at the Purple Pig is typical for most bars. Appetizers, hamburgers and sandwiches are the main attractions, but, unlike many bars, the Purple Pig does not shrink its menu on game days. This ensures there is something for just about everyone. Additionally, there are food specials every Saturday.

In terms of drink selection, the Purple Pig is on par with most Aggieville bars. There are 10 beers on tap, and the selection of bottles and hard liquor is average. The drink menu does have one item you won't find anywhere else — the "KSU Kick Ass" drink, which is a game day favorite because of its purple color.

The group, Powercat Pride, is designed to involve students in the football program. This is the first time the department has created an opportunity for student involvement of this nature.

The program is designed to present volunteers with opportunities to have an effect on K-State football. Each member of this team will, through his or her participation, use and develop his or her skills and talents in campus and public relations, work closely with coaches, and ensure the message of K-State football effectively reaches prospective players, campus and community.

BSB | Youth baseball coach convicted of 2 lesser accounts

UNIONTOWN, Pa. — A youth baseball coach accused of offering an 8-year-old money to bean an autistic teammate so he couldn't play was convicted Thursday of two lesser charges against him and evaded more serious charges.

A jury convicted 29-year-old Mark R. Downs Jr. of corruption of minors and criminal solicitation to commit simple assault, Fayette County authorities said.

Downs was acquitted of criminal solicitation to commit aggravated assault, and jurors said they were deadlocked on a charge of reckless endangerment.

Shop On The Wildside

For 16 years, family-oriented store has created welcoming atmosphere for loyal customers

By Mark Sibilla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In 1972, musician Lou Reed urged listeners to take a "Walk on the Wild Side." Reed's dystopian vision was that of a seedy Manhattan underground, populated by hustlers, drug addicts and washed-up actors "losing their head while giving head."

This Manhattan doesn't have quite the bevy of colorful characters as New York, but the town does have its own Wildside, where adventurous consumers can find a variety of jewelry, tapestries and clothing to augment their own inimitable style.

On the Wildside opened in May 1990 in Aggieville. It originally was owned by Gary Bedenharn and shared a spot with Krazy Kris's Novelties, said Jaina Lambert, employee of On the Wildside and daughter of current owner, Julie Stutheit.

Bedenharn sold jewelry, tapestries and tie-dyed T-shirts, Lambert said. Eventually Krazy Kris's left, and On the Wildside was able to occupy the entire building. The store expanded its inventory to include candles, incense, posters, door beads and more clothing, she said.

Lambert said she began working at On the Wildside in 1996, and her sister, Megan Stutheit, joined her in 1999.

In April 2001, Bedenharn sold On the Wildside to Julie Stutheit. Bedenharn opened On the Wildside with the intention of it being a family-oriented store, and Lambert said Bedenharn sold the store to her mother because she already was a part of the Wildside family.

Lambert said Romeo, a white cat adopted by Bedenharn in 1990, came with the store (or perhaps the store came with him). Romeo was a part of the Wildside family until he died in 2005 at the age of 17. Diva was adopted shortly after Romeo died and now fills the role of store cat.

"We have always tried to make the store feel like a family business," Lambert said.

When Stutheit bought the store, she made certain changes to the store's set-up and the products stocked, Lambert said. The most important change was separating the tobacco section from the rest of the store. The change was made to allow employees to better monitor the section and prevent access by minors, she said.

"We also added a lot more clothing, including women's dresses, and we began selling supplies for disc golf," Lambert said. "The disc golf is very popular; it has really taken off."

Some of the most popular products On the Wildside sells are posters, tapestries, door beads, clothing and incense, Lambert said.

"We sell a lot of incense," she said. "Almost everyone has a package of incense with them when they buy something."

Christopher Hanewinckel | COLLEGIAN
On the Wildside opened in Aggieville in May 1990. The store sells various items, including door beads, clothing, incense and posters.

The main clientele of On the Wildside is college students, Lambert said. A large group of locals of all ages who frequent the store.

"We have a lot of people of my parents' ages who came here when they were younger and whose kids now come here," Lambert said.

In keeping with the family-oriented atmosphere, Lambert said the employees of On the Wildside all are either family or family friends.

Charlie Sutterlin, sophomore in theater, is the sole On the Wildside employee who is not a blood relative. Sutterlin said he has known Julie and Mark Stutheit since he was young.

"My parents are friends with them, and I literally grew up with them," Sutterlin said.

Sutterlin said he began working in May 2005, when an employee was needed to work odd hours and weekends.

On the Wildside has been an Aggieville staple for 16 years, and Julie Stutheit said she attributes the success to its atmosphere and customers.

"The key is to be friendly, help people and be open-minded," she said. "There are a lot of friendly people that come through the door, and we have so many excellent loyal customers."

Network assesses, communicates risk of food-borne illnesses

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An addition to the College of Veterinary Medicine will increase the safety of food, from "the farm to the fork."

Creator of the Food Safety Network and associate professor of diagnostic medicine and pathobiology Doug Powell said the network's information works to decrease food-borne illnesses from where the food starts at the farm to where it is produced, distributed and later served.

"Many people don't know that one in four people die a year from food-borne illnesses," Powell said.

He said the Food Safety Network is a joint project with K-State and the University of Guelph at Ontario, Canada.

According to the Food Safety Network Web site, the network provides research, policy evaluation and public information on food safety issues.

Powell said the network is like an electronic newspaper that releases news every day to the world.

"It provides information about food safety in all sorts of weird and wild ways," he said.

A software program is used to help find information about food safety, and it searches the Internet, he said.

Justin Kastner, associate professor of diagnostic medicine and pathobiology, said the Food Safety Network is an internationally recognized institution for people who want to know more about food safety and its complexities.

"What's exciting is it is a virtual institution where students, businesses, farmers and consumers can go to learn about food safety," Kastner said.

M.M. Chengappa, director of diagnostic medicine and pathobiology, said Powell's addition to the department brings a new dimension to research and teaching.

"We are pretty good in food safety, but it's the societal part that we're missing," Chengappa said. "Powell adds that component with the research program."

He said the network reaches about 70 countries daily.

Curtis Kastner, director of the Food Science Institute, said veterinary medicine relates to the safety of food because the products are from animals, and the animals' well-being affects the food that comes from the animals.

"Therefore, it was logical that the College of Veterinary Medicine be home for the Food Safety Network," he said.

Powell said he first visited K-State last fall with Justin Kastner. While speaking, Powell mentioned how flaws in the three-in-one hand-washing system in the K-State Student Union bathrooms could create bacteria.

Powell said he later was invited to meet with K-State President Jon Wefald, who offered him a job.

Justin Kastner said he became involved with the project when he worked with Powell to receive his doctorate when the network was at the University of Guelph.

"Doug (Powell) is a pioneering scientist with a desire and a vision to try to foster awareness for food safety," Justin Kastner said. "His work spans across animal and plant foods."

EA's NCAA video game competition draws crowd

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Video game enthusiasts worked their skills Thursday to win two tickets to the Citrus Bowl and a chance to win $10,000.

An emcee announced play-by-play actions of the games and drew crowds on the ground floor of the K-State Student Union. Students could be seen on all levels of the Union watching the event over the ledges.

The event was sponsored by the Union Program Council. Registration began at 11 a.m., and competitions began at noon, lasting until the champion was named.

Tim Brown, tournament commissioner for the challenge, said the game played for the tournament was EA's NCAA Football '07.

"It's a very hot game now, and probably one of the best, if not the best," he said.

He said the tournament will travel to 15 other colleges, and the winner aat each school will later compete in the final contest for $10,000.

Many people not participating stayed to watch the competitions. Students crowded around the most exciting games and cheered according to good and bad plays made by the competitors.

Several former contestants gathered around a couch to watch the final match on the big-screen television between Andrew Walter, junior in political science, and Jason Mann, junior in sociology.

Walter, the champion, said he had been in line at the Union since 10:30 a.m. to start the competition.

He said he didn't know who he will give the other Citrus Bowl ticket to, but he looks forward to the next competition.

"It's pretty cool and will be the experience of a lifetime," Walter said. "And if I win the $10,000, I'm throwing a big party."

Walter said he got second in the challenge last year.

Students who wanted to participate had to show their student IDs and then received a T-shirt. Their names were put on the bracket in different divisions, and they were called over an intercom when it was their turn to play.

Candace Staker, senior in family studies and human services, said she entered the challenge for fun.

Staker had only played the game a few times before the contest and lost in the first round. She came with a friend, against whom she played during first round, and whom she said she had seen play many times before.

"He really knows what he's doing," Staker said. "I've seen him sit and play for hours in front of the game."

Staker was one of three girls who entered the competition.

Brown said the company has the event because it's a good promotion and supports students.

"We love giving back to the students and supporting campuses," he said.

K-State students compete in the Electronic Arts NCAA football tournament, sponsored by Best Buy and Xbox in the K-State Student Union Courtyard Thursday morning. More than 75 people competed for a chance to win $10,000 and two tickets to the Citrus Bowl.

RADIO | Students encouraged to listen, provide feedback on air

Guests might include student senators, K-State officials or even the school mascot.

"We could bring Willie on," Lucas said. "But he doesn't talk much."

Katie said she encourages K-State students and the Manhattan community to listen to the show, as she feels that SGA activity can broaden listeners' knowledge about university activity.

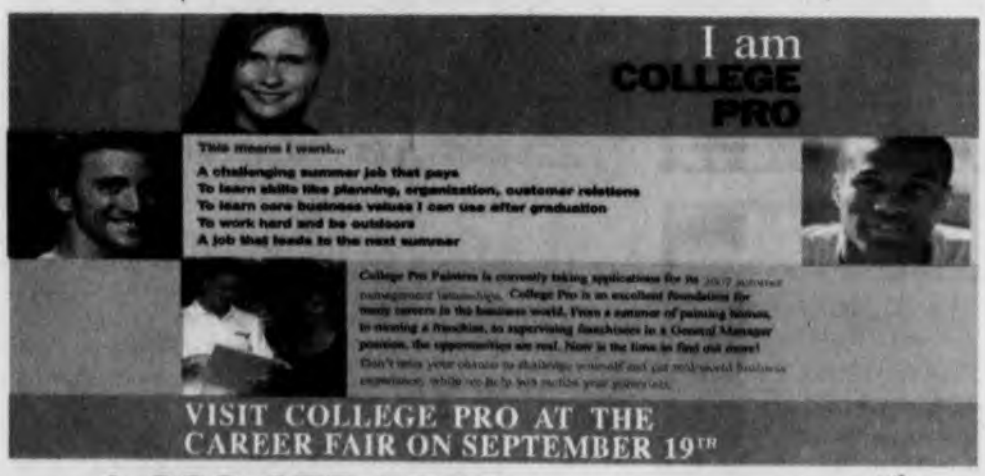
"I have learned so much more about K-State from being involved in student government," Katie said.

"Hour of Accountability" airs at noon on Sundays on KSDB-FM 91.9.

"Students should listen so that they can have an active voice in student government," Lucas said.

He said he envisions the show to be long-term, with future SGA presidents keeping the show alive.

"The Maddys are coming in with great energy," said Casey Berner, junior in social science and Wildcat 91.9 talk show director. "I've never seen a show start with such excitement and preparation.



"I believe that if the Maddys run their term with the same positive energy that they have with their talk show, the student body is in great hands."

The Maddys also plan to address the other two C's in their campaign platform. For community, they are currently working with administrative help to obtain a non-voting city commission seat for K-State. For career, they have plans to expand the Wildcat Works program creating alumni connections for students.

Quartet opens jazz series tonight

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's time to jazz things up.

The Manhattan Arts Center will begin its Swing City Series with the Midtown Quartet at 8 tonight at the arts center.

Tess Purvis, program and marketing director at the arts center, said the quartet performs mellow jazz.

"It's really nice jazz," she said. "It's cocktail club jazz."

Swing City jazz series

- Midtown Quartet
  8 p.m. Sept. 15
- Ron Gutierrez, vocals
  8 p.m. Oct. 21
- K-State Student Combos
  Ensembles include Swing Machine, House Records, Mambo Combo and Combo Nation
  8 p.m. Dec. 1

Penny Senften, executive director of the arts center, said the quartet is a group new to the arts center series.

"It's a group that we haven't had before," she said. "They'll have a different show. It's fun to have people in here who haven't been here before."

Purvis said the group plays original works but also will play pieces all jazz fans will recognize.

The group, which plays instrumental pieces, does not keep with one specific time period of jazz, Purvis said, which keeps the audience guessing.

"You go to jazz, and it's new every time," she said. "We're proud of spreading it all out."

For people who might consider attending, Purvis said everyone is welcome.

"Feel free to walk in at the last minute," she said. "Jazz musicians don't mind if you walk up and around. If you're in your shorts and T-shirt, come in your shorts and T-shirts."

Tickets are $13 for adults and $8 for students and can be purchased at the arts center box office.

Chinese language partners meet, mingle at party

By Kerry Fischer
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Chinese Language Program had a language partner party Tuesday night in the Flint Hills Room of the K-State Student Union.

"The purpose of the party was to create an opportunity in which Chinese language students met Chinese native speakers to become language partners and practice language with each other," said Wei Wu, instructor of Chinese and program director.

Guests at the party included Provost Duane Nellis, who spoke to students about his trip to China; Robert Corum, head of the Department of Modern Languages; and Kristin Mulready-Stone, instructor in history who studied Chinese.

Wu said the number of students in the program has doubled this fall from what it was last fall.

Wear less to look like MORE

ALEX PEAK

Whether it's being used to control shine, blotchy areas, hide trouble areas or blemishes, bring color to certain regions or create illusions that features are larger (like lips) or smaller (like noses) than they really are, most women wear some sort of makeup most of the time.

I understand covering up zits, wearing a dash of mascara and applying some blush and lip gloss before heading out. What I don't get are the girls who deck out, practically in full night-wear, just to go to class.

It's an intriguing phenomenon. Some ladies roll out of bed and slip into half-clean sweats and tennis shoes. They might wash their faces or add deodorant before scampering off to class. All the while, their counterparts wake three hours early to shower, set curls, apply at least eight different kinds of eye shadow and saunter off to class in a freshly pressed outfit.

There's nothing wrong with wanting to look your best all the time, but does your best have to involve a mask of makeup and three-piece suit?

Although I am a minimalist in the cosmetics department, I think there are essentials for going to class or work, going out at night and for special events (formal functions or weddings).

If you're simply preparing for the day, work or school, you don't need to be made up like a prom queen. Concealer, mascara, blush, lip gloss and maybe a light shade of eye shadow will do. Go for the natural look.

When you're going out for the night, feel free to apply more makeup and color. Stick with daytime cosmetics, but add two or three different eye shadows instead of just one to create glow and richness.

Save the 75-step make-up process for special events like weddings or formals. When these kinds of events do come up, it is legitimate to spend hours getting painted. This is when the layers of foundation, concealer, eye shadow, mascara, eye liner, powder, blush, lip liner and lipstick are actually sensible and not out of line.

I don't like to wear piles of makeup, but I do suggest people wear an amount they feel comfortable with. I lean more toward natural beauty (and less pore clogging), but there's nothing wrong with looking like a harlot at 8 a.m., if that's what makes you feel good about yourself.

Make-up application tips:

- Use dark to light shades of eye shadow. The magic is all in the blending. Make sure you can't see the lines where one color starts and another ends.
- When it comes to eye liner, carefully follow the natural curve of your eyelid — inner to outer corner. Eye liner helps give depth to lashes. Be cautious not to get eye liner on the inside of eyelids or between lashes; it can be unhealthy and can lead to eye infections.
- If you're going to wear mascara, it helps to curl lashes before adding the color.
- Be sure to take good care of your skin. Always wash your face before applying makeup and before going to bed. Also, exfoliate at least once or twice a week, and use an astringent after cleaning. Use moisturizer (preferably one with an SPF) before putting on any make-up.
- Dab foundation on with a make-up sponge. Try not to use your fingers, as they will add unnecessary grease to your face.
- To help add or balance color on the face, use a round brush and stroke blush from the cheekbone back toward your ear.
- In general, wear lip gloss or chapstick. Save the lipstick and liner for special events.

Staple items, simple rules improve men's fashion

KRIS FITZGERALD

Well, men, of course you are. I know, most of us usually don't (or at least don't want to) admit we rely on each other for any fashion tips whatsoever. Bear with me. You can skim this article or read it secretly while sitting on the toilet. I don't care. Whether you are a freshman or a fifth-year, here are some short tips I have adapted to my own wardrobe that can finally help you achieve that big goal: a sense of style.

No popped collars: Although you might think you look ridiculously good-looking, you don't. The only time this is acceptable is if you happen to be wearing a track jacket.

Polos: Polos are a nice thing to have in a variety of colors, stripes and designs. To really catch that sexy coed's eyes, try a tighter polo. You could even roll the sleeves on a long-sleeved polo. Try layering with a printed tee or an eye-grabbing color, but please be respectful to others and don't blind us with something radioactive. You need to catch her eye, not the eye of a woman on a space shuttle.

Shoes: Shoes are an important aspect of everyday attire. They can make or break an outfit. During the fall and summer, flip-flops are a popular choice, but make sure you don't have ugly feet, or you'll earn yourself a one-way ticket to loneliness. New tennis shoes work well for any outfit. Adidas Superstars and Puma Romas are two popular types of sneakers and are perfect matches for any attire – jeans, shorts, a T-shirt or a polo. Stay away from extreme colors like bright green, yellow and orange. You want to look good, not like a clown.

T-shirts: T-shirts serve valuable purposes, like providing layers with a polo. T-shirts are fun on their own, too. There are many different types, but stay away from the Michael Bolton-style shirt or shirts with weird pictures or words. Retro might be back, but some of those shirts are downright wrong.

Printed tees work well with most any outfit. If you have the body, wear a more fitted shirt to show off some muscle. But please, please don't make it so tight you have a permanent nipple erection visible through the fabric.

Pants/Shorts: The ripped look is in now. The more holes you have, the better the designer must be, right? Wrong. You can still look good with a simple pair of pants that don't have rips in them. As long as they aren't total crotch-huggers, you'll be good. However, if you are stern about wearing jeans with holes in them, shop around for ripped jeans.

Shorts are also a great item to own. Khaki shorts can be worn with any outfit. They can be both semi-professional and casual, so with different styles of khakis, you'll be golden.

No matter what you should keep a couple pairs of jean shorts on hand. Bring those out only when the rest of your clothes are dirty.

Some interesting facts about the movies playing in Manhattan this weekend:

- "Everyone's Hero" is the film Christopher Reeve was working on at the time of his death.
- David Fincher had originally planned to direct "The Black Dahlia."
- "Little Miss Sunshine" took nearly five years to make, mostly due to financial reasons.
- In the remake "The Wicker Man," there is a "missing" sign in the police station with a photo of Edward Woodward's character from the 1973 original.
- Greg Kinnear researched his role in "Invincible" by spending time with Dick Vermeil during his final year as the head coach of the Kansas City Chiefs.
- "The Covenant" was shipped to cinemas under the code name "Full Power."
- When at an actual racetrack getting audio clips for "Talladega Nights: The Ballad of Ricky Bobby," director Adam McKay apparently didn't need to prompt the audience for one scene. When Sacha Baron Cohen's character Jean Girard was introduced as a driver from France driving the Perrier car, the entire crowd started booing on their own.

Off The Field with Reggie Walker

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Reggie Walker was one of the few true freshman to play last year. He played in nine games last season at linebacker and finished with 16 tackles. He also recorded one of the key defensive plays against Nebraska with a tackle for a safety. Walker entered this season as a starting outside linebacker and has seven tackles in the first two games. But what is he like off the field?

Q. How hard is it to keep up the dreads?
A. At first, it takes it a while to lock up, but after a month or so when it locks up and it's all good. You have to twist consistently. It's a bad habit of mine – I'm always twisting my hair.
Q. On your player biography, it says you were part of a math club in high school. What is that about?
A. Our teacher said that if we joined the math club, she would give us 30 or 40 points of extra credit. I'm not the best math student, so I jumped all over that.
Q. What was it like living in Alaska?
A. I remember the wildlife in our backyard. We had a pool in my backyard, and you would see random animals come out of nowhere and just walk up to you like they didn't care.
Q. You have moved around all over the United States. What is your favorite place to live?
A. California. Nothing against Kansas, but if you have been to California, you wouldn't want to leave.
Q. Why did you?
A. I left to play here. When I used to live in Missouri, I grew up watching (K-State), and I wanted to be a part of it.
Q. What do you listen to around campus or before a game to get ready?
A. It depends. I listen to a lot of reggae, but before the games it's whatever I am feeling. I might be some reggae or some hip-hop, just something to cool me down and relax.
Q. What is the biggest cultural difference between California and Kansas?
A. Sacramento, before I left, was the No. 1 culturally diverse city in America. Coming here was just like black and white.
Q. Was it a culture shock for you coming here?
A. When I was in Missouri, it was basically the same. I don't care – I like everybody.
Q. What is your favorite hobby outside of football?
A. I used to break dance, and I was good. I'm still pretty good, but I don't really do that much off the field. I used to be a real big beat boy back in the day.

K-State vs. Herd

OFFENSE

The Wildcats put up an impressive 45 points last weekend against Florida Atlantic University, but still have some areas to work on. Quarterback Dylan Meier completed only 50 percent of his passes, and Jordy Nelson didn't catch a single pass. That needs to change if the Wildcats want to win this weekend.

By scoring 54 points last weekend against Hofstra, the Marshall offense proved it can pack a punch. The Thundering Herd ran all over the opposition and wound up with more than 300 yards rushing. Additionally, Marshall was efficient in the passing game, completing 25 passes on 33 attempts.

DEFENSE

The defense showed its potential last weekend by shutting out Florida Atlantic and holding the Owls to only 200 yards of total offense. Particularly impressive was the defense's ability to stop the run. The Owls were held to a mere 59 yards on 42 carries. The secondary did well too and will need to continue improving this week it hopes to contain a potent Marshall offense.

Marshall has allowed 73 points in its first two games this season. Unfortunately for the Wildcats, those numbers might be a bit misleading. While the 41-10 thumping Marshall took against No. 6 West Virginia in week one was legitimate, the Herd's defense was actually quite good in last week's 54-31 victory against Hofstra, holding the Pride to only 264 yards of total offense.

SPECIAL TEAMS

With the exception of Justin McKinney's 88-yard kickoff return, the Wildcats' special teams left a lot to be desired last weekend. Kicker Jeff Snodgrass missed two of his three field goal attempts and punter Tim Reyer averaged only 34.5 yards per punt. Nevertheless, if K-State can get points from its return men again this week, it just might be enough to give it the edge.

The Marshall special teams have been unimpressive so far this season. Junior kicker Anthony Binswanger had two extra point attempts blocked last weekend against Hofstra, exposing a weakness the Wildcats will be eager to take advantage of. Additionally, the Thundering Herd averages only 36.6 yards per punt and will have to do better if it wants to win in Manhattan this weekend.

PREDICTION

This marks the final episode in the three-match agreement between Marshall and K-State. The series is tied at one, and this weekend's winner will go home with bragging rights. Expect an evenly matched game between two teams eager to prove themselves. K-State narrowly takes this one and gains momentum heading into next week's clash with Louisville.

Junction City now friendlier

By Kristen Roderick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

JUNCTION CITY – When most students think of Ron Prince's childhood hometown, they think of three things – strippers, crime and violence.

But those who live in Junction City are working to eliminate that stereotype.

"Back in the '70s and maybe before that, there was a philosophy about Junction City being this rough and tough, head 'em up cowboy type of place," said Rick Dykstra, assistant director of the Geary County Convention and Visitors Bureau. "Junction City has transformed into a great community for families. Our struggle now is to change people's thinking about Junction City."

"The town, since 1988, has seemed to become more tightly woven and friendlier than what it was when I first got here," Pratt said. "After the Big Red One went out during Desert Storm, everyone had to get a little tighter. They knew they couldn't rely just on the military."

After 1988, the same year Prince graduated from Junction City High School, residents began to rely on each other for support, and Junction City evolved into a more family-based community.

Those who knew Prince said his family helped him avoid the rough parts of town and maintain his positive attitude.

"One set of my friends' parents are his parents' neighbor, so they remember him and tell me how nice his family is," Pratt said. "They all have respect for them."

When Prince was introduced as the new football coach on Dec. 5, 2005, he said his parents and the community are what made him who he is today.

"I was raised by very supportive parents and by a network of people in the community that was the most ideal situation a young person could ever grow up in," Prince said at the press conference. "The diversity, the strength and the toughness of the people in that community, as well as communities around the state, are why people from this area are known around the region in the same ways that I described. That is the way I want our team to be described."

Now, the closeness and friendliness of Junction City attracts people to the town.

"Everyone likes the town," said Cori Pratt, Rod's wife and mortgage consultant at Choice America Lending LLC. "Everyone knows everyone. I think it has a really good reputation."

Residents of Junction City are proud of their town. Especially when they heard a hometown boy was going to be K-State's football coach.

"It's nice to see a good Kansas boy right there," Rod Pratt said. "To me, it's important to have someone from Junction City. To have someone who's close is really impressive that we have somebody with that capability to run a football program, with that kind of experience and knowledge."

Rod and Cori Pratt have been going to K-State football games since before Bill Snyder came to Manhattan and reconstructed the football program.

As owner of Dick Edwards, Rod said he used to give away 20-25 tickets to the games. He said he remembered when they had to have a free concert for people to buy tickets.

"There was a free concert to see Willie Nelson in the '80s, and all you had to do was buy a ticket to the football game," he said. "I think the ticket sales were 5,300 people to go to the free concert. That is, if you suffered through the game."

In Prince's first two games as head coach, about 45,000 people have attended each game.

Rod Pratt said he is excited to see what Prince will do with the program.

"The next game is the real eye-opener, to find out what is going to happen," he said.

"It's nice to know that it's going to be televised; it's showing that we are being recognized again. I hope it keeps going that way. You can't expect a miracle overnight, but I hope we have a winning season being it's their first year."

Home field disadvantage

By Nick Dunn
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When the average fan thinks of great college football rivalries, chances are K-State versus Marshall doesn't immediately spring to mind.

The Thundering Herd won't be confused with K-State's rival Kansas by any Wildcat fans, but when K-State takes the field on Saturday against Marshall, players from both teams will have more on their minds than just this year's game.

"Any team that you play could turn into a rivalry," senior linebacker Maurice Mack said. "That's just what makes college football. You can play a team three times, and the next thing you know, it turns into a rivalry."

It all started three years ago, when the Wildcats started the season 4-0 and climbed to No. 6 in the nation. Marshall came to Manhattan as a huge underdog but handed the K-State community a shock.

The Herd upset K-State 27-20 and effectively ended the Wildcats' dreams of a national title. The loss hurt the K-State players enough, but what the Marshall players did after the game hit the Wildcats where it really counted.

Several players from Marshall strutted out to the 50-yard line and taunted K-State by stomping on the Powercat logo.

"(The older players) see it as a rivalry because of what happened," sophomore linebacker Reggie Walker said. "When they came in here they disrespected the school and the program a lot by stomping on the logo. A lot of people want revenge on both sides."

After not playing against each other in 2004, K-State traveled to Huntington, Va., last season to try to even the series. It was another hard-fought, hard-hitting contest, but this time K-State prevailed 21-19 because of a Justin McKinney interception in the final seconds.

Again, the winners couldn't leave the field without a little extra celebration. The two teams met at midfield, and a brief shoving match ensued.

"Some words were said, some actions started, but nothing serious happened," Mack said.

Walker had a different take on the situation.

"I was just like, 'Oh, man. Please don't let me get hit and get my scholarship pulled,'" Walker said. "I was just trying to separate everybody so we didn't have any suspensions or be on ESPN looking stupid."

So when the two teams square off Saturday in the rubber match of this three-game series, every player will be looking to control his emotions and focus on the task at hand.

"It's going to be a fun game," senior quarterback Dylan Meier said. "There's going to be a lot of electricity. As players, we live for games like this. It'll be my job as leader of the offense to keep everybody composed and make sure everybody's head is in the right position."

New coach Ron Prince wasn't around for the history between the schools, but he said he understands it. As a player, he was involved in similar rivalries, he said.

"I'm really not interested in any kind of nonsense that occurs outside the lines," Prince said. "I know their coach isn't interested in that either. I don't think there's much room in there to focus on those other things."

When asked if he would protect the Powercat if Marshall players taunted the K-State team this year after the game, senior running back Thomas Clayton said he would.

"This is our house, and we're going to protect it," Clayton said. "Just use your imagination."

Wildcat defense to focus on slowing down former Prince recruit

By Cedrique Flemming
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Ahmad Bradshaw has all the tools he needs to be a great running back.

At least that's what K-State football coach Ron Prince said when he signed Bradshaw while coaching at Virginia.

Bradshaw has since moved from Virginia and is now the starting running back for the Marshall Thundering Herd.

He will get the opportunity to showcase his talents in front of his former coach and the rest of the Wildcat faithful Saturday when his team visits Snyder Family Stadium to take on K-State.

"This is a very unique backfield that we are going to face. It's unique in the standpoint that I know a lot about Ahmad Bradshaw," Prince said. "This is a player of tremendous talent. He's a hard-nosed player who has speed and contact balance. He has all the things you would want in a running back. He can catch the ball, he's elusive in space, and he can run with power. (Marshall) is more than just the Ahmad Bradshaw show, but he is a significant player, and I think he'll be one of the better backs we face all year."

Marshall opened its season against the No. 5-ranked West Virginia Mountaineers. Bradshaw had 18 carries for 70 yards against one of the best defenses in the country, even though the Thundering Herd was defeated 42-10. He also had three catches for 25 yards.

Then Bradshaw had a breakout game last week against Hofstra. He rushed the ball 17 times for 152 yards and scored a career-high four touchdowns en route to a 54-31 victory. Three of his four touchdown runs were more than 20 yards, including a 30-yarder and a 40-yarder.

He is currently ranked 15th in the nation with 111 average yards per game.

"He is a physical back," free safety Andrew Erker said. "He is a guy that will, if you give him a chance, run you over or make a move if he has to. Not quitting would be our biggest solution to the problems that he presents, along with consistent pursuit of the defensive backs."

When K-State played at Marshall last year, Bradshaw was one of the lone bright spots in a 21-19 loss to the Wildcats. He had 58 yards rushing and five receptions for 33 yards. He also scored both Marshall touchdowns.

Last week, Morris went 20-of-27 for 153 yards and two touchdowns. He had 14 rushes for 151 yards against Hofstra, becoming the first Marshall quarterback since 1978 to rush for 100 yards in a single game. He and Bradshaw became the first backs in Marshall history to rush for more than 150 yards in a single game.

Wildcat sophomore running back John McCardle played defense last season before switching to offense over the summer. He said he remembers how good the Marshall offense is.

"They have a great running back, and I remember (Bradshaw) had a screen last year where he broke a bunch of tackles and made a lot of guys look stupid," McCardle said. "We are going to have to do what we can to keep him under wraps."

Improving secondary breaks in several new players

By Jonathan Garten
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The members of K-State's last line of defense were able to hold their heads a little higher after Saturday's 45-0 win over Florida Atlantic.

In week one, the Wildcat secondary gave up 253 yards and three touchdowns to Division I-AA opponent Illinois State. Things went more smoothly against the Owls – ranked 115th in scoring offense – as K-State held them to 141 yards on 12-of-25 passing.

The secondary used 12 different players against Florida Atlantic.

"I think that first game is a little sticky," Erker said. "But as you get going, you get used to the season, and a lot of guys get their first snaps done with so they can move on and get ready for the rest of the season."

So far this season, the Wildcat pass defense is giving up an average of 197 yards a game. Coach Ron Prince said he was pleased with the work defensive coordinator Raheem Morris and graduate assistant Scott Frost have done with the K-State secondary.

"Our ability to develop players from the middle of the roster is going to be one of the key things that happens for us on an ongoing basis," Prince said.

One of the coaches' projects has been true freshman cornerback Joshua Moore. He made his defensive debut against Florida Atlantic, finishing tied for second on the team with six tackles.

Prince said the Wildcats were fortunate to sign Moore, a native of Pompano Beach, Fla., and lifelong Florida State fan, to a scholarship. Even a late offer from the Seminoles could not break Moore's commitment to K-State.

Moore credited Morris as the reason he came to Manhattan. He said Morris was the coach who recruited him most.

"I liked everything about him," Moore said. "He's so excited. He brings everything to the game."

Erker, who made his first career start against Illinois State, said he was impressed by Moore's performance against Florida Atlantic.

"Josh Moore is probably one of the most athletic kids on this team," Erker said. "He can do anything he sets his mind to. He handled himself very well in his first game, and I can only imagine that he'll do even better the next one."

When Moore arrived at K-State last summer, it was clear he was special. Junior cornerback Justin McKinney said the plan now is to get Moore up to speed with the rest of the defense.

"We've been working with him and trying to get him into the program," McKinney said. "His performance so far hasn't surprised me at all because he's a real good athlete."

This week the Wildcat secondary will be faced with the task of shutting down Marshall and quarterback Bernard Morris.

Last year, Morris was 7-of-12 with 73 yards passing before safety Marcus Watts injured him with a hit on a passing play in the first half.

The sophomore has 12 catches for 110 yards and a touchdown this season.

Defensive back Bryan Baldwin finished with one solo tackle and a pass break-up, and he picked off a pass and returned it 21 yards against Florida Atlantic on Saturday.

In the season opener against Division I-AA Illinois State, Byron Garvin and the Wildcat defense struggled to slow down the Redbird offense. Illinois State finished with 346 yards of total offense, 253 of which came through the passing game.

K-State, Marshall need more than 3 games to start true rivalry

JONATHAN GARTEN

There's a big game this weekend nobody should miss. Some are even calling it "the final game of a three-game contract that has spawned one of the most heated intersectional rivalries in the nation."

What game is this?

What's the matter? Expecting something more along the lines of Southern California and Texas? Miami and Florida? Or maybe Notre Dame and whoever it's playing this week? If so, you're not alone.

Marshall and K-State are not rivals. After this week, there's no guarantee they will meet on the same field again.

So why all the hype for a game that probably won't be remembered? There must be some reason people are looking forward to this weekend.

The truth is, there is a bit of history between the universities. The games have been decided by a touchdown or less. The visiting team has come away with the victory both times. And there have been plenty of post-game festivities.

In 2003, the Thundering Herd kicked off the three-game series by beating the No. 6-ranked Wildcats 27-20. Marshall then celebrated midfield on K-State's giant Powercat.

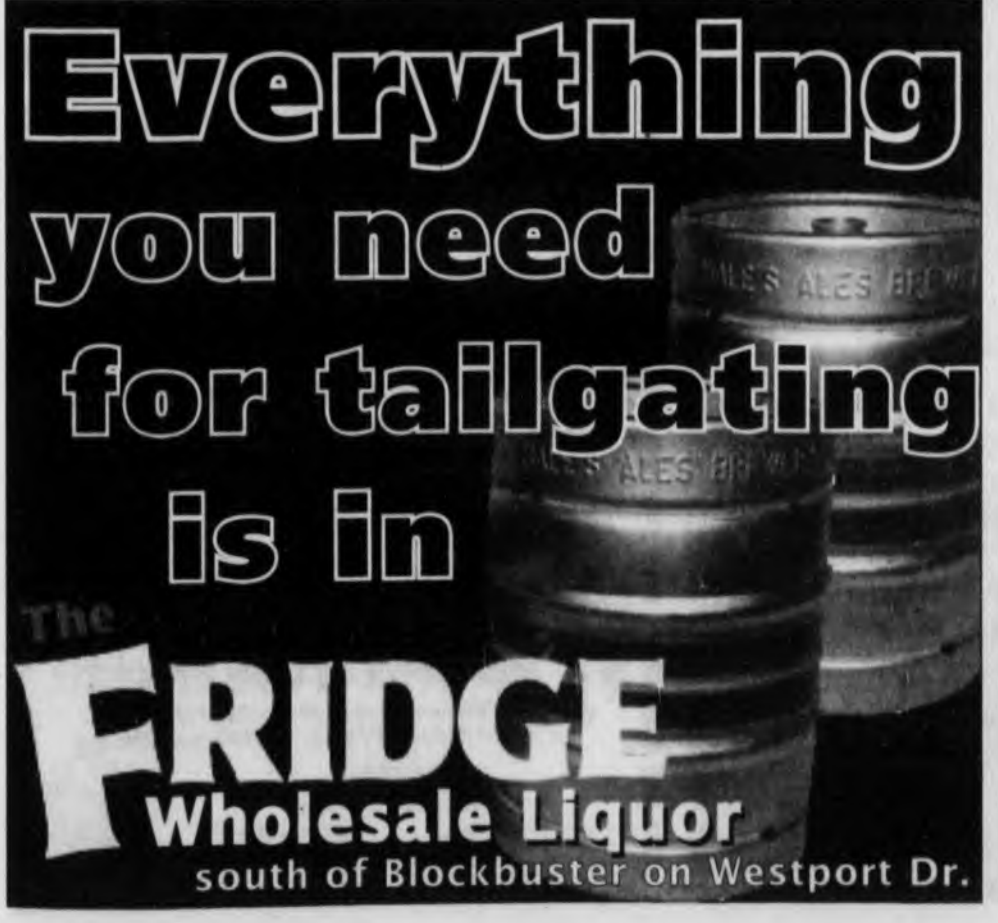
K-State was the one dancing on someone else's logo in 2005, after beating Marshall 21-19. Herd players defended their field by starting a shoving match with K-State players.

That's really all there is to it. A couple of close games. Feelings were hurt. Logos were stomped on. That's it.

But there seems to be too many questions about things like smack talk and defending school pride. People everywhere – or at least at Marshall and K-State – are buying into the hype. Meanwhile, the rest of the nation could care less.

If this game was an actual big deal, it would be televised on a better channel than Fox Sports Net. That way the people who aren't in Fox's regional coverage could see this "much-anticipated rivalry."

I have nothing against this game. It will be fun to watch two teams that are excited to play each other and have a history of close games. That's as much as you can expect from a non-conference contest.



It's difficult to actually start a rivalry with a non-conference opponent. A rivalry needs time to grow – more time than three years.

Silent leader

Norwood's role at tight end changed, grew with installation of Prince's West Coast offense

By Nick Dunn
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

His teammates describe him as a quiet player, always going about his own business. His coaches say he is a leader. He said he just wants to do anything he can to help his team win.

However you describe him, Rashaad Norwood is silently pushing his way to stardom at the collegiate level. It is the breakthrough many fans and critics have been expecting from Norwood, the junior tight end for the K-State football team.

After posting only 13 receptions for 160 yards in the 2005 season, Norwood is off to a fast start through the first two games this season. He leads the team in receptions with eight and receiving yards with 93, and appears to be on his way to crushing his season totals from a year ago.

In an offense designed to put the ball in the hands of the tight end, that kind of production is expected.

"Coach (Ron) Prince says every day that in this offense, the tight end is never covered," senior quarterback Dylan Meier said. "If he's man-to-man, he's still not covered. We're supposed to get him the ball every time."

As offensive coordinator at Virginia, Prince was known for his development of great players at the tight end position. Perhaps his best product was Heath Miller, who won the Mackey Award in 2004 as the nation's best tight end. Miller now plays for the NFL's Pittsburgh Steelers.

Norwood said he knew of Prince's reputation and appreciates the chance to work with him.

"I watched a couple of Virginia's games when they were on, and I saw that he threw the ball a lot to the tight end," Norwood said. "In the offseason, he just worked with us on different blocks and how to get yourself right. Coach Prince is pushing us harder in everything we do."

Prince arrived at K-State with an almost entirely new coaching staff and immediately installed a new West Coast offense – an offense that requires a talented tight end with a superb ability to catch the football.

"We all know that (Norwood) has talent," Prince said. "One of the things we tell tight ends is that in order to be called a receiver, you have to be able to receive the ball. If you're unable to receive it, you can't be called a receiver."

Recruited by both Kansas and K-State out of Schlagle High School in Kansas City, Kan., Norwood chose K-State because he said he wanted to play for a winning team.

"K-State went to more bowl games," Norwood said. "I looked at it as, I want to do more winning than losing. Nobody wants to lose. I really didn't like my recruiting process. Everybody says it's supposed to be fun, but mine wasn't fun at all. I just wanted it to be done and over with."

Unfortunately for Norwood, he redshirted his first season – 2003 – the last season the Wildcats had a winning record. Plagued by inconsistent play in 2004 and 2005, Norwood went into this past offseason hoping for a new start and looking to prove himself.

"He's gotten more confident in himself," wide receiver Jordy Nelson said. "He's just stepped up, and he knows what he's supposed to do."

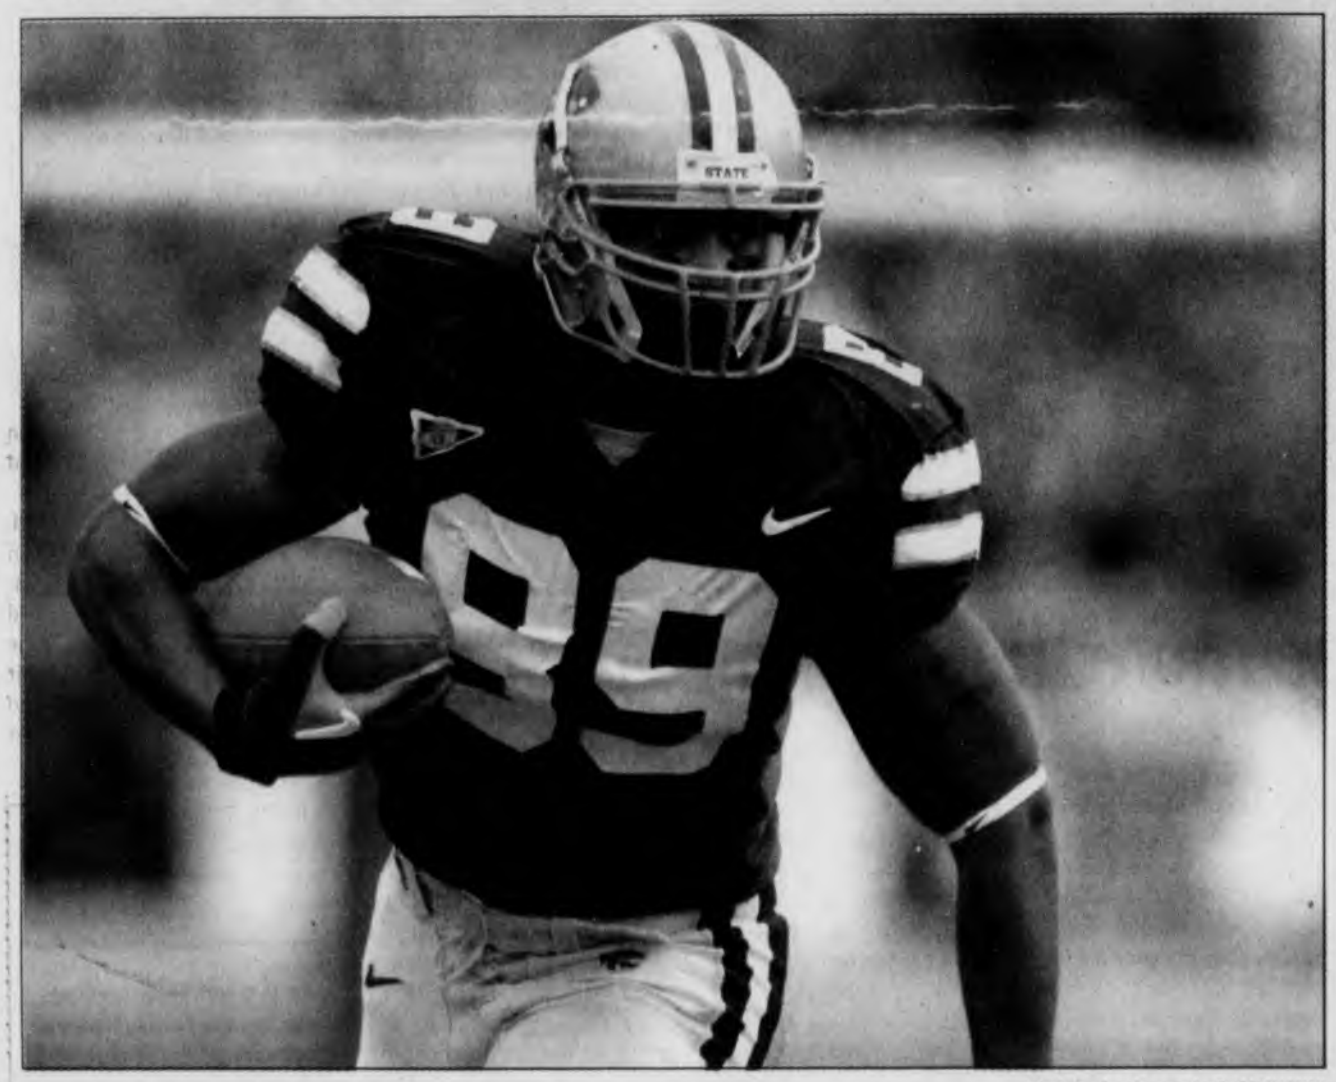
Even with his success so far this season, Norwood is quick to direct attention away from himself – a quality that seems to fit his personality. He said that leading the team in statistics isn't important to him.

"That's not my main focus," he said. "It's not about me trying to be the leading receiver or having the most yards. It's about us as a whole collective team."

His teammates look at him as a leader. The stars on every team are always counted on to lead the other players, but Norwood is not a typical leader.

"He doesn't say much," Nelson said. "He's kind of a quiet guy on the field. He just wants to get his job done and move on."



◆ ◆ ◆ ◆

Each member of the team approaches leadership in his own way, Meier said.

"He's pretty quiet," Meier said. "It's just different strokes for different folks."

"I never really notice it, but the coaches always tell me that I am (a leader)," Norwood said. "I'm not a person that says a lot to get people up. I do what I got to do. You could say that I lead by example."

Christopher Hanewinckel | COLLEGIAN

Tight end Rashaad Norwood is K-State's leading receiver with eight catches for 93 yards. In the season opener on Sept. 2 against Illiniois State, Norwood caught a career-high five passes for 53 yards.

Perspectives on Prince

By Jeffrey Rake
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Doug Doughty has been covering Virginia football for the Roanoke Times for more than 25 years. He was there throughout Ron Prince's tenure as offensive coordinator at Virginia and offered some insight into K-State's new coach.

Q. How would you describe Ron Prince's version of the West Coast offense?

A. Virginia's offense was installed by Bill Musgrave, who was the Cavs' offensive coordinator for two years before going to Jacksonville. Musgrave was a true West Coast guy, who played at Oregon and was an NFL backup under John Elway. Musgrave had been hired because (coach) Al Groh wanted to have a West Coast offense. I wouldn't say there was a major shift when Prince replaced Musgrave as offensive coordinator in 2003. You might expect an offensive line coach-turned-coordinator to run the ball more, but that 2003 team threw a lot, largely to tight end Heath Miller. The next year, with 5-foot-10 Marques Hagans replacing 6-foot-5 Matt Schaub at quarterback, Virginia made greater use of Hagans' scrambling ability. Prince is to be commended for his flexibility.

Q. How deserving is Ron Prince of the head coaching opportunity he has now at K-State?

A. I wouldn't say Prince is undeserving. I might have thought it was a reach if he didn't have Kansas roots, but I did feel he had leadership ability – as much as you can see from a Virginia assistant.

Q. What was the perception of Ron Prince at Virginia? Were the fans pleased with the offense for the most part?

A. I really didn't know how popular Prince was with his players and recruits until he left. Committed recruits elected not to sign with Virginia last year after Prince went to K-State. I never heard much bitching about Prince and his play-calling. Of course, he had two playmakers at quarterback who would have made a lot of coordinators look good.

Christopher Hanewinckel | COLLEGIAN
Coach Ron Prince hugs Justin McKinney after he ran the opening kickoff 88 yards for a touchdown.

Q. What was the response around Virginia when Prince was announced as K-State's new coach? Were they as shocked as the people of Manhattan, since his first head coaching job was such a high-profile position?

A. I can understand how the K-State fans were surprised. I'm sure when his name surfaced that most people out there had never heard of him. You wouldn't have found his name at the top of most lists of hot young assistants. Yet, he had done a good job at a reputable program. People at Virginia weren't stunned that somebody came after him.

Q. How much responsibility can Ron Prince take for the development of current NFL players such as D'Brickashaw Ferguson and Heath Miller?

A. Ferguson was a starter from day one, even as a true freshman, so I don't know how much credit Prince should get for that. But he got the job done with a very inexperienced unit in 2002; so far, the offensive line has really struggled in his absence.

Q. Based on your observations, what are some of Ron Prince's greatest strengths as a coach?

A. Prince has good presence. He was a young guy, but I think he commanded respect. Maybe some of that was his size. I also felt he was intelligent and well-spoken - a good communicator. He looks you in the eye.

◆ ◆ ◆ ◆

Walker Freer is a writer for the Cavalier Daily at the University of Virginia. He covered the football team during Prince's tenure as offensive coordinator at Virginia. Freer discussed some observations and judgments he has made about Prince.

Q. Did Virginia fans think highly of Ron Prince, and were they pleased with the offense while he was the coordinator there?

A. I can't say Virginia fans were completely satisfied. The week after they upset fourth-ranked Florida State at home, they traveled to unranked North Carolina and lost 7-5, with two of the five points being a result of a defensive safety. What I've noticed over the past few years has been the inability for Virginia's offense to adapt during a game. The game plan the coaches map out heading into the game is the one they stick with, whether it is working or not.

Q. What was the response like around Virginia when it was announced that Prince – a virtual unknown – had been chosen to take over a large program at K-State?

A. General shock. The interview process by Kansas State was kept relatively quiet, and Prince was never viewed here as a "hot coordinator" who might be picked for a head coaching position elsewhere. Nevertheless, I think many fans were excited to see an alumnus of the Virginia coaching tree move on to a head coaching position.

Q. Were you personally surprised that K-State would take a chance on an unproven coach like Prince, who never had any previous head coaching experience?

A. I was extremely surprised. I know Prince has roots in Kansas, but I would have assumed that K-State would have pursued a bigger-name coach, especially since their program has been elevated to such a high level over the past two decades.

Defense looks to build on dominating performance

By Austin Meek
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State special teams unit dominated the headlines after accounting for 22 points in the Wildcats' season opener. Not to be outdone, the Wildcat defense responded with a dominating performance of its own as K-State thumped Florida Atlantic 45-0 in game two.

Here's a breakdown of K-State's defense heading into Saturday's showdown against Marshall.

Christopher Hanewinckel | COLLEGIAN

Linebacker Brandon Archer leads the team through two games with 19 tackles. In Saturday's win over Florida Atlantic, the defense held the Owls to just 200 yards of total offense.

DEFENSIVE LINE

All along, coach Ron Prince has worked to build depth at his defensive line positions. That strategy seemed to pay off against Florida Atlantic as 11 different defensive linemen recorded at least one tackle.

"The best D-lines I've gone against are the ones that are constantly rolling people at you," Prince said at his Tuesday media conference. "I thought that everybody who went in the game performed well."

This fast, aggressive defensive line showed the ability to put pressure on the quarterback, but also looked vulnerable against the screen pass, a fact that won't go unnoticed by opposing coaches.

"The best D-lines I've gone against are the ones that are constantly rolling people at you. I thought that everybody who went in the game performed well."

Ron Prince
FOOTBALL COACH

LINEBACKERS

After combining for 23 tackles against Illinois State, Brandon Archer and Zach Diles registered just seven against Florida Atlantic, and that's not necessarily a bad thing.

First of all, it means the defensive line was doing its job and making tackles at the line of scrimmage. Also, the lopsided score allowed Prince to insert second- and third-string linebackers in the second half.

SECONDARY

After surrendering 253 yards through the air against Illinois State, K-State's secondary clamped down against Florida Atlantic, limiting the Owls to just 141 yards.

True freshman Josh Moore registered six tackles, including two behind the line of scrimmage, and Bryan Baldwin's interception set up a touchdown.

Still, the Wildcats have been vulnerable to big plays in the passing game, and the K-State secondary will be tested against Marshall.

BOTTOM LINE

K-State's first shutout since 2003 will be an important confidence-builder for this defense.

Granted, Florida Atlantic wasn't exactly an offensive juggernaut, but that shouldn't take away from an impressive defensive performance.

If last week is any indication, the K-State defense will be ready for its toughest test of the season against Marshall.

Marshall at K-State

5 keys to victory

By Austin Meek
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

1. WIN THE TURNOVER BATTLE

Turnovers have played a key role in the brief but heated history of this series. K-State committed four turnovers in a 27-20 loss in 2003, including an errant option pitch that was returned for an 84-yard touchdown. Last season, Justin McKinney's game-saving interception was one of five turnovers forced by the Wildcats in a 21-19 victory. The Wildcats need to play opportunistic defense and take care of the football on offense.

2. SLOW DOWN AHMAD BRADSHAW

Ron Prince has a lengthy list of superlatives to describe Marshall's talented junior running back. Fast, elusive, powerful – they all apply to Bradshaw, who ran for 152 yards and four touchdowns last week against Hofstra. Prince knows all about Bradshaw, who originally committed to Virginia when Prince was an assistant coach with the Cavaliers. Bradshaw will get his yards, but the Wildcats need to make him work for every one of them.

3. MAKE BIG PLAYS ON SPECIAL TEAMS

K-State has had a kick-return touchdown in each of its first two games and will look to keep the streak going against the Thundering Herd. McKinney's kickoff return aside, Prince said he felt the Wildcats missed some opportunities in the return game last week. The Wildcats will need to take advantage of those opportunities against Marshall. K-State also needs a solid performance from kicker Jeff Snodgrass, who missed short field goals in each of the first two games.

4. MAKE "HOLLYWOOD" A STAR

Thomas Clayton rolled up 152 yards and two touchdowns in last season's meeting. If Clayton can put together a similar performance this season, it will open up K-State's passing game and take pressure off quarterback Dylan Meier. Much of this depends on K-State's offensive line, which showed improvement last week. Marshall will provide the toughest test of the young season – the Thundering Herd limited Hofstra to just five yards on the ground last week.

5. STAY COOL

The Wildcats have been diplomatic this week, playing this off as just another game. Still, there's little doubt both teams will be amped up for this game, especially after the midfield shoving match that erupted last year.

The Wildcats need to play smart and maintain their composure. An early turnover like the one they committed against Illinois State could be disastrous.

Area churches, ministries offer contemporary options for students

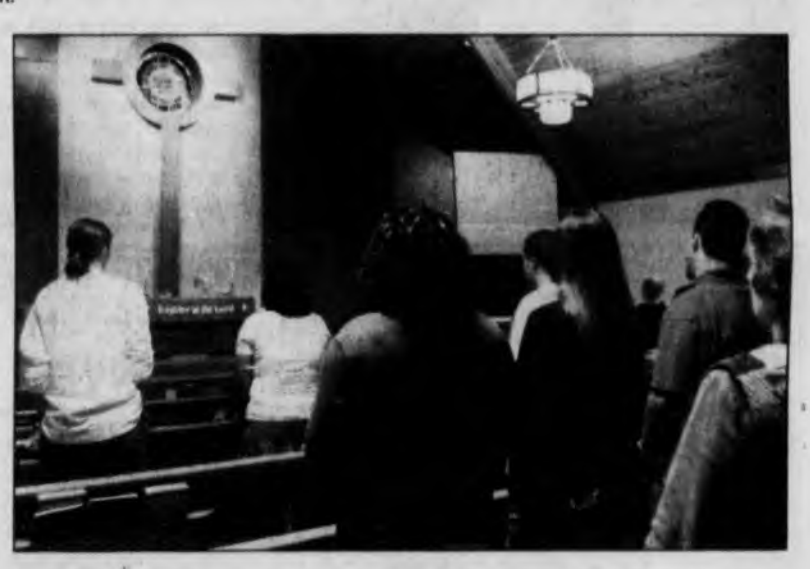
"Ninety percent of our congregation is students," said Father Keith Weber, priest at St. Isidore's Catholic Student Center. "That large number really makes a difference in the atmosphere of our congregation."

St. Isidore's offers many opportunities for students seeking to get involved in their parish, like choirs, educational classes, prayer services, Sunday services, retreats and even yoga classes.

Weber said the church has activities like miniature golf, leadership workshops and theology classes.

Matt Carter, member of Cats for Christ campus ministry, said his organization focuses on four specific areas.



"One is relationship opportunities, where we focus on getting to know each other," Carter said. "The second is spiritual growth, which we accomplish by Bible studies, and the third is service opportunities, where we do activities like working for Habitat for Humanity."

The last area of focus is outreach opportunities, which involves talking about Cats for Christ and letting others know what the group does, Carter said.

He said there is a retreat near Ottawa, Kan., every semester.

Secretary of state explains electronic voting to K-State class

Ron Thornburgh, Kansas secretary of state, speaks to an Introduction to Political Science class about new voting technology Friday afternoon in Waters Hall.

By Brendan Praeger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

If implemented correctly, new voting technology will allow every vote to be counted the way the voters intended, Ron Thornburgh, Kansas secretary of state, said Friday.

Thornburgh visited K-State to speak to an Introduction to Political Science class about new voting technology and the dangers of partisan politics. One of Thornburgh's assistants, a former K-State student, helped arrange the appearance.

The class doesn't have guest speakers often, professor Aruna Michie said, but it's easy to rearrange the course schedule when the speaker fits the educational goals of the class.

Thornburgh has been working with county governments to ensure electronic voting works well in November.

"The actual technology is 30-40 years old, but its application in elections is new," Thornburgh said. "The machines are easy to use. The challenge will be training the board workers at the polling places. The average age of a board worker is something like 132, and they're scared to death of the new machines. We need to recruit new volunteers while training the old ones."

Thornburgh began working on election reform after the problems with the 2000 presidential election in Florida.

"(In Washington, D.C.), Democrats were blaming Republicans, Republicans were blaming Democrats, everybody was yelling and screaming and pointing fingers and trying to make

U. KENTUCKY SENATE ASKS FOR DOMESTIC PARTNER BENEFITS

The University of Kentucky Staff Senate asked the school Thursday to consider domestic partner benefits in a resolution passed 55-25, with one abstention.

Kyle Dippery, Staff Senate chairman, said for the university to succeed in its Top-20 business plan, it must be able to bring in top employees. Offering benefits is one way to do this, Dippery said.

"Offering domestic partner benefits recognizes that top faculty and staff come in all lifestyles," Dippery said. "It's important to provide an environment that is tolerant of various lifestyles."

CORNELL U. STUDENTS GATHER AT 'PIRATE NIGHT'

At the "Pirate Night," sponsored by the Museum Club students were greeted by belly dancers balancing swords on their heads and jugglers tossing brightly colored objects into the air. This night of revelry, included a treasure hunt, customized eye patches, dancing, music, pirate humor and, of course, art.

WASHINGTON STATE U. USES HAND SCANNERS TO DEBIT ACCOUNTS

Suranjan Chakraborty, teaching assistant for Management Information Systems, briskly walks through the Atrium Cafe in Todd Hall shortly before 9 a.m. After ordering a cup of dark-roast coffee, he walks up to a machine near the register.

At the machine – a biometric hand scanner – Chakraborty enters his eight-digit Washington State University ID number into a numeric pad and places his hand on the scanner. Within seconds, the machine confirms his identity and debits his account $2.05 for coffee and a blueberry muffin.

Assistant MIS professor John Wells, who is behind the new technology, said he and his research team have been looking into people's impulse-buying habits. The average student has to juggle too many things, he said. The hand scanners have been designed to allow students more freedom.

'Capitol Steps' satires government

By Kristen Roderick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students got a taste of topical government humor Friday as the group "Capitol Steps" performed in the K-State Student Union Ballroom.

The performance was part of a dinner theater organized and sponsored by Union Program Council.

"It's fun to see what UPC is doing," Mary Fox, junior in political science, said. "The money they receive they're putting to really good use."

"It was great," Fox said. "A lot of the jokes hit home to the stuff we make fun of."

The part of Bush was played by Brent Mendenhall, who is known for his impersonations. He has appeared on "The Tonight Show," "X-Files" and "The Daily Show," according to his Web site.

The "Capitol Steps" troupe began performing in 1981 when three people working for Sen. Charles Percy created song parodies and skits for a Christmas party, according to the "Capitol Steps" Web site.

Fox said even though she enjoyed the performance, there were parts of the show that could have been revamped.

"Some of the jokes were over my head," she said. "That's what they could have improved."

Faculty discuss adding organic farming program to curriculum

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The creation of undergraduate programs in organic farming across the United States is making K-State faculty discuss the possibility of bringing a program close to home.

Jana Beckman, coordinator of the Kansas Sustainable Agriculture Center, said several graduate programs for organic farming exist around the country, including Washington State University and the University of Florida, but undergraduate programs are the newest trend.

While K-State currently does not have an undergraduate major in organic farming, Beckman said faculty have been working to add it as an option under a different major. But where to add it is the question.

"The problem is, it fits everywhere," Beckman said.

Rhonda Janke, associate professor of horticulture, forestry and recreation resources, is one person helping to find a fit for the program. Janke said K-State is working to incorporate an undergraduate course or program in organic or sustainable farming into the curriculum.

The group has discussed implementing a sustainable agriculture minor, and Janke said this might have entry-level classes leading to broader topics about organic farming, including studies in insectology and natural research management.

While faculty are looking to add the program, Janke said the earliest implementation would be fall 2007 or fall 2008.

Student curiosity is propelling talks about new courses. If students want it, they are going to get it, Janke said.

"To me, in the last four to five years, more students are interested," Janke said.

No specific class on organic production has been offered until this year, Janke said. She is teaching a class this fall and has eight students in the course.

Beckman said students who want to be farmers who raise organic products and those wanting to work in other parts of the organic process have driven the growing need for an undergraduate program.

"There's really two sets of students interested," she said, "those who want to farm that way, and those who want to work in that industry."

According to the Organic Farming Research Foundation's Web site, "Organic farming management relies on developing biological diversity in the field to disrupt habitat for pest organisms, and the purposeful maintenance and replenishment of soil fertility."

Beckman said the handling and process of the food determines if it will receive the organic food label.

"If you're going to claim it's organic, you need to be able to document that it wasn't mixed with another product," she said. "It goes way beyond the production."

Beckman said people think of organic farming from field to fork.

"The key to organic farming is that you work with the entire system – the soil, the insects – all of the pieces," she said. "Plus, you begin to bring in the sociology of nutrition."

Jonathan Thomforde, senior in horticulture vegetable production, has worked on organic farms during high school and college and said the industry needs more people.

"I think it's an important thing for any university to have now, because it's such a growing industry," he said.

An awareness of organic farming has come from the realization, Thomforde said, that it is environmentally friendly and has high nutritional value.

Implementing an undergraduate program in Kansas would make the state a leader in the Midwest, Thomforde said, but the interest in organic farming needs to be addressed in the near future to make the state progressive in agriculture.

"It's up and coming in the next 20 years," he said. "It's going to blow up here."

The economics of Seinfeld

SHANE SANDERS

When you watch a much-loved TV show, you like to think the actors are exactly the same in real life as the imperfect characters they play. Rather than truth, this notion generally turns out to be a symptom of one's naïve attempt to live vicariously through a fictional storyline.

The actors in a TV show usually are more imperfect, and less redeemable, than their fictional counterparts. This is true, of course, because actors are faced with real problems, while fictional characters deal with fake problems that are destined to resolve themselves in one way or another.

"Seinfeld," the popular TV comedy of the 1990s, is a strong case in point. While the characters stayed together in their dysfunctional way, the real-life actors have not shown such unity. The chief elements of the group's undoing seem to be a) money and b) ego.

While Jerry Seinfeld, the fictional character, always would reluctantly allow Kramer to loot his refrigerator for food, Seinfeld the person has a much harder time sharing. He has resisted pressure from his three co-stars to share syndication profits, as well as profits from the sale of the show's DVD.

The latter dispute caused two of Seinfeld's co-stars, Julia Louis-Dreyfus and Jason Alexander, to forego participation in interviews for the DVD. Upon hearing about this sad state of affairs, my first thought was not that Person A deserves this or Person B deserves that.

My first thought was, in terms merely of profitability, it is not smart for Seinfeld to offer his co-stars nothing more than a standard studio fee in exchange for their interviews.

To some degree, the DVD is an inferior product without interviews from Dreyfus and Alexander. In other words, the demand curve for Seinfeld DVDs would shift outward if interviews from Dreyfus and Alexander were included. Ceteris paribus (Latin for "with other things being the same"), this demand shift would lead to greater revenues from the sale of the DVD.

Even if including the interviews produced only a tiny demand shift in relation to the magnitude of sales, it follows that Seinfeld's lawyers could have improved the situation for all parties involved. They could have offered the co-stars some amount of money up front, in exchange for interviews, such that a) the co-stars would receive reciprocity beyond the standard studio fee, and b) Seinfeld's own profit from DVD sales would increase.

Additionally, consumer surplus, or the total value consumers derive from purchasing the DVD beyond the amount they paid, would rise with the inclusion of the interviews.

To summarize, by meeting the demands of his co-stars, Seinfeld could increase the girth of his own wallet and those of his co-stars, while simultaneously increasing the degree of consumer well-being created by the DVD.

After considering these facts, I came to two conclusions: 1) Seinfeld is stupid, and 2) the people handling Seinfeld's business affairs are stupid.

Then my friend enlightened me. Seinfeld, like most humans, doesn't value only money in the bank. He also values the sense that he is special. By conceding anything more than a standard actor's fee to his co-stars, he would have said, "You are more than standard actors in a TV show. Creatively, you helped make 'Seinfeld' what it is and deserve credit for that."

Apparently, Seinfeld values protection of image more than any profits garnered from improving his DVD. Hence, it is not Seinfeld's stupidity, but his ego that has cost us so much.

Internet video satisfies interest in others' more exciting lives

KELSEY CHILDRESS

For those who haven't heard, in the past month or so, a young girl by the name of "lonelygirl15" on YouTube.com has become the star of a hit video series.

YouTube.com is a popular Web site that allows people to upload their own videos for free. "Lonelygirl15," also known as Bree, is a homeschooled 16-year-old who has only one friend – an average-looking older guy named Daniel.

However, Bree seemed a little too pretty, too fashionable and too smart to be a lonely girl. Subscribers began to guess about Bree, if she was real, what her religion was, even if the numbers her purple monkey puppet held up to rate cookies were a date.

As the mystery and drama unfolded, suddenly the "creators" of Bree released a message claiming they had written the show as a new type of media outlet. They are simply a group of young aspiring scriptwriters who happened to fool one of the largest Internet communities today.

Many were mad about the hoax, while others claimed they will continue watching "lonelygirl15" entries, because they are so entertaining.

This offers an interesting point. Why are we so interested in others' lives? People cared enough to spend their time researching and writing about this girl they didn't even know. The creators of the show didn't release Jessica's identity; instead, it was discovered by some enthusiastic fans of the episodes. There was nothing to earn from discovering the truth about the show; people simply wanted to know.

Learning intimate details about people's personal lives is becoming easier and easier, especially as the Internet makes almost any information readily available. With Facebook.com and Myspace.com, all you need is a name, and you can usually find a profile displaying the person's class schedule, interests and relationship status.

Of course, people volunteer this information to be published on the Internet. Privacy seems almost a thing of the past.

Perhaps one of the reasons we care so much about each other is that others' lives usually seem more interesting than our own. They have newer drama, better-looking significant others, and qualities we wish we possessed.

"Lonelygirl15" was innocent, brilliant, beautiful, confident and funny. Who wouldn't want to be like her? Perhaps by getting to know her, she will transfer some of her amazing qualities to us by osmosis or magic rays.

Telling someone to mind their own business doesn't hold as much weight as it used to. Before the age of technology, we usually couldn't glean information about others unless they volunteered it themselves or a neighbor or relative did the snooping for us. It is convenient to know the truth about people, but there are times it is disappointing.

If "lonelygirl15" isn't real, who is?

TO THE POINT | An editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

K-State offers rare opportunities for learning, especially during harmony week

Ninety percent of Kansas' population is white, according to the U.S. Census Bureau. The national average is 80 percent.

With demographics like that, it can be easy to overlook the importance of other cultures. Here, we aren't forced to learn about other races and ethnicities.

Instead, most of us stick with the Euro-centric background the majority of the population shares.

Fortunately, at K-State, we have more opportunity to learn about other cultures. K-State students hail from more than 100 different countries, according to the International Student Center.

We have events like Community Cultural Harmony Week that facilitate discussion through speakers, movie showings, presentations and panels. We have international student groups and classes that focus on world issues.

We should consider ourselves lucky. Because we have the opportunity to educate ourselves and build relationships with people of diverse backgrounds.

This week we should step outside our routines to join in events that could introduce us to new people and different ways of thinking.

At 7 p.m. Tuesday in the Union Little Theater, check out Cuban drum group Manos, or watch The Quorum, a movie about a New Orleans coffee shop open to people of all backgrounds in the 1960s at 7 p.m. Wednesday in Forum Hall

GUEST COLUMNIST

What's the matter with students?

This is not a rant about students getting worse. After many years, I still find students wonderfully capable and engaged – even if facing more distractions, work pressures and a decay of academic atmosphere, not to mention Facebook.com.

This is like the rant of our Lou Douglas series speaker, Thomas Frank, the Kansas native who wrote the best-selling book "What's the Matter with Kansas?"

Frank says we have, over time, been duped politically. He argues how we Kansans (and Americans) came to think and vote against our own economic interests. The argument works for students, too. The semester's first Collegian opinion piece attacked those daring to raise the minimum wage.

Since that position hardly seems student-friendly, the writer invented a clever fiction to resent – a burger-flipping Green Day fan needing cash for a rock concert.

Such cynicism does political work, and such media-assisted fictions begin to seem like facts, just as the famous "welfare queen," supposedly living in a ritzy Chicago hotel at taxpayer expense, was invented by Ronald Reagan. Too bad she didn't exist.

Even now, amazingly, we find many soldiers who think we actually were attacked by Iraqis on Sept. 11, 2001 – a falsehood condoned, promoted and finally denied by an administration that directs its propaganda not at its enemies, but at us. Too bad the student writer couldn't speak with an actual student who truly might need that extra money – if not for rent, then at least for all those expensive textbooks professors require.

In recent years the Collegian editorialized against a small increase in the local sales tax, calling it "unfair." The reason given was that, since the tax went to local education, K-State students wouldn't benefit from it.

Good reasoning? Well, by the same standard, neither I, nor any Kansas taxpayer without children in college, should support the university with our taxes. As legislatures cut funding with little objection from students asked to pay more of educational costs, what would students say if this anti-tax logic doubled their tuition? Why shouldn't they pay the whole cost?

Students wouldn't like to hear that they are all on welfare, but that's what state-supported education entails, not everyone only paying for just what they "use." What's forgotten is the patriotic duty to the "general welfare," a phrase not from the liberal phrasebook but enshrined (as "market law" is not) in what we are celebrating now, the U.S. Constitution. We should be pledging allegiance to it.

Let the duped resent the poor Green Day kid for making an extra buck, rather than, as Frank notes, a rock band, like Green Day itself, getting more obscenely rich by the budget-busting tax cuts.

As the administration broke its promise on student funding, Republicans also slashed $12 billion from student loan programs, aiding the industry that fills Republican campaign coffers. As more students will now be burdened with college debts their entire lives, the average household headed by a college graduate now earns less, in income adjusted for inflation, than five years ago.

The dominating party also sneaked through a provision that a single mother on welfare no longer would be allowed to attend college. Try to imagine the increasing misery of such a mother striving to improve her chances, perhaps with three unruly sons and no health insurance, barely able to get through K-State anyway, even as every social service help is cut. Let her try to do it flipping burgers.

Everyone should know the poor suffer more with the latest blessing conferred on the rich. Hearing the lie that there's "just no more money," she watches a government willing to spend any amount for scandalous war-profiteering, schools in Iraq and failed "abstinence only" programs.

No need to imagine this single mother, however: she exists. I taught her here. Assisted by more compassionate and responsible attitudes about general welfare then, she later was able to become a tenured professor.

It wouldn't happen now. In the current climate of students going against broader student interests, it might be that our only hope, beyond critical self-awareness, is for privileged students to start speaking more loudly for the weaker voices of the underprivileged.

Quartet, guest musician open jazz series Friday

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jazz came to Manhattan Friday night.

The Midtown Quartet, with guest Will Matthews of the Count Basie Orchestra, performed Friday night to open the Swing City Jazz series at the Manhattan Arts Center.

Matthews, a guitarist, said he has been with the band for 11 years.

"I have to tell you it's a great honor to perform with him," Matt Kesler, the Quartet's bass player, said.

Also performing with the band was Dwayne Mitchell, lead singer; Mark Acuff, guitarist; and Wayne Goins, drummer and associate professor of music at K-State.

Goins said Mitchell impressed him, and that Mitchell's influences were much the same as his own; these influences include Grant Green, Joe Pass, Wes Montgomery, Kenny Burrell, Pat Metheny and George Benson.

"I was just knocked out by his playing," Goins said of Mitchell.

Goins joined the band performing on his guitar, which he said was a "rare treat," as having three guitarists on stage simultaneously, but not competing, is unusual.

The Swing City Jazz program at the arts center will sponsor two more performances in the series.

Vocalist Ron Gutierrez will perform on Oct. 21, and on Dec. 1, KSU Student Combos, including Swing Machine, House Records, Mambo Combo and Combo Nation, will be directed by Goins.

"We're proud of what we have here at the MAC," Goins said.

Breakthrough performer

Ian Campbell — Defensive end

After a quiet performance last week against Florida Atlantic, Ian Campbell made things difficult for Marshall quarterback Bernard Morris. Campbell finished with six tackles, three of them solo. The defensive end also had two tackles for a loss, including a quarterback sack.

The K-State defense held Marshall to 142 total yards of offense. Safety Kyle Williams, along with defensive back Byron Garvin, each finished with a team-high seven tackles. In its first two games, the Thundering Herd averaged 233.5 rushing yards, but it was held to just 50 yards on 22 attempts, a 2.3 yards per carry average. The Wildcat defense has not allowed an offensive touchdown in eight consecutive quarters, dating back to the fourth quarter against Illinois State.

Quarterback Dylan Meier dropped back to pass as the Marshall blitz came flying at him. Meier quickly read the Thundering Herd's man-to-man coverage and found his receiver, Jermaine Moreira, with a pass.

Moreira turned and eluded several defenders on his way to a 44-yard touchdown, sealing a 23-7 victory for the Wildcats on Saturday at Snyder Family Stadium. The play finished off a four-catch 95-yard game performance by Moreira.

But when coach Ron Prince met Moreira on the field after the score, it was not to congratulate the senior wide receiver. Prince wanted to be the first person to yell at Moreira for a celebratory dive into the end zone, causing K-State to be penalized 15 yards on the ensuing kickoff.

"I'm not going to tolerate that behavior," Prince said. "That kind of behavior has hurt us the last few weeks, and I'm not going to accept it."

Junior safety Marcus Watts called Moreira's run one of the best he had seen. But his emotions quickly went from excitement to disappointment as he watched Moreira soar over the goal line.

"I said, 'Oh no. Now we have to play defense from the 40 or 50 instead of pinning them deeper," Watts said.

Moreira's penalty came two weeks after another Wildcat got the same call. In K-State's 24-23 victory over Illinois State, Byron Garvin recovered a fumble on a kickoff and dove into the end zone for a touchdown.

Every game makes a statement

"Statement" is one of those buzzwords that gets tossed around like a football at Texas Tech. If I had a dollar for every time an athlete uttered the words, "We need to come out and make a statement," I could put my name on a football stadium.

AUSTIN MEEK

Saturday was billed as "Separation Saturday," but it easily could have been called "Statement Saturday." Actually, I think I like that better. "Separation Saturday" sounds like a day when everyone runs around and tries to separate their shoulders.

In all honesty, every Saturday could be "Statement Saturday." Every game is a statement, albeit not always the intended one.

For instance:

KANSAS — LOST 37-31 AT TOLEDO IN DOUBLE OT
Intended statement: "We're a rising program that can knock off a quality opponent on the road."
Actual statement: "All these overtimes are making me hungry."

NOTRE DAME — LOST 47-21 VS. MICHIGAN
Intended statement: "We are the odds-on favorite to play in the national championship, and our quarterback, Brady Quinn, is the Heisman Trophy front-runner."
Actual statement: "Um, you know all that stuff about the national championship and the Heisman Trophy? Yeah, never mind."

LOUISVILLE — WON 31-7 VS. MIAMI
Intended statement: "After this game, everyone will know that we're the real deal. Put our BCS invitation in the mail."

NEBRASKA — LOST 28-10 AT SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA
Intended statement: "We're not fazed by the bright lights of Los Angeles or the USC mystique. We're back among the college football elite."

Defense holds Herd to 142 total yards

By Nick Dunn
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The obvious strength for K-State in Saturday's 23-7 win over Marshall was the defense. Led by superb play from the entire front seven, the Wildcats held a Marshall team that came in averaging 233.5 rushing yards in its first two games to just 50 yards on 22 attempts, a 2.3 yard per carry average.

In particular, Thundering Herd quarterback Bernard Morris was held to -8 yards (in part because of three sacks) after entering the game with 188 yards rushing in two games.

The defense seems to be clicking, which will be important with a potent Louisville offense coming to town this week. If not for a special teams touchdown by Marshall, K-State would have posted its second consecutive shutout.

DEFENSIVE LINE

Solid play from the four down linemen is crucial in order for a Cover 2 defense to succeed. Against Marshall, the defensive line was consistently in the backfield, showing the ability to disrupt both run and pass plays. Seven different linemen recorded tackles in the game, showing again that the consistent rotation of players helps to keep them fresh.

"We're all in pretty good shape right now," defensive end Ian Campbell said. "We all have confidence in everybody else. If I go down, or somebody else – hopefully that won't happen – but you can have confidence in the next guy."

The unit combined for three tackles for a loss, led by Campbell with two tackles for loss and a sack. The pressure applied to Morris led to a number of errant throws, allowing the secondary to come through with two key interceptions. In addition, the line was not easily tricked by screens and draw plays, as it had been in the previous two games.

5K campus fun run win prizes for speed, costumes

Besides the usual runners, there were bicyclists, a couple kicking a bright orange soccer ball as they ran, and a student dressed as Santa's helper.

The first-time event, sponsored by Jardine's Plaza community, had 12 competitors run a course on campus. They began at Davenport Hall and ran down Jardine Drive to Mid Campus Drive, then to Claflin Avenue, and returned up Denison Avenue.

Participants completed three and a half laps and finished at Dykstra Hall for a total of 5 kilometers, or 3.1 miles.

Seth Schmidt, junior in finance, was the first runner to finish, winning a pedometer for his time of 17:20. Schmidt said he runs 30-40 miles a week.

Organizers also handed out awards for the fastest time. Joshua Long, senior in art, rode a bicycle and won with a time of 13:50.

Long, a resident of Moore Hall, said he enjoyed the nice weather and relatively flat course.

He said he normally rides his bike 10 miles a week on off-road trails.

"I wanted to get out and do something," he said. "This sounded like fun."

Sponsors awarded a clock to the competitor with the most perseverance and gave Halloween decorations to the only competitor who entered the best costume contest.

"I knew there was going to be a costume contest," he said. "And I knew I wasn't going to win fastest time."

Kuehnert said he chose his costume based on clothes he already had.

Sunday marked Kuehnert's first 5K, which he finished in 24:11.

"We wanted to have an active program while it was still nice outside," she said. "We opened it to all the residence halls. It's sort of a preparation for the Homecoming 5K."

Tasha Harvey, Jardine resident assistant and senior in architectural engineering, said she enjoyed the race.

"I think everyone had a lot of fun," she said. "It gave us a chance to get out and meet new people."

New exhibit features landscapes, ceramics

By Jesse Sachdeva

Pastel paintings of Kansas prairies and Colorado forests adorned the halls of the Strecker-Nelson Gallery Thursday night as part of the gallery's new exhibit, "Kim Casebeer: At Home In The Hills."

Casebeer, a K-State graduate and the exhibit's featured artist, specializes in Midwestern landscapes, and many of her autumn-themed paintings are on display.

"In this fast-paced world, we all need some peace, a reason to slow down and take in the beauty around us," she says. "That's what my work is about."

Casebeer worked as a graphic designer before becoming a full-time artist in 2002. She has been featured in galleries throughout the country.

Fields' and Williams' pieces center on a teapot theme. Many of Williams' pieces take a surreal, warped and brightly colored form, while Fields' works include intricate designs and incorporated natural objects. For example, one piece includes sea urchin spines.

Fields, also a K-State graduate, has had his work displayed both nationally and internationally but said he holds a soft spot for Strecker-Nelson.

"They have by far the best gallery in the state, hands down," Fields said.

"We usually have a new exhibit every six weeks," Clint McAllister, Strecker-Nelson employee, said. "Our next opening should be around the first week of November."

headlines, but no one was solving the problem," Thornburgh said.

"Florida's biggest problem was the lack of a statute defining exactly what a vote was. Every city had its own rules. It was chaos. Uniformity is needed across the entire state, and of course, you'll never see punch cards used in Kansas."

One member of the class expressed concern about electronic voting and the possibility of fraud, but Thornburgh said he is confident in the accuracy and security of the voting machines.

"It would be easy to hack into the machines, but they are never connected to any communication device. I'm unaware of any technology that allows access to a computer through a power outlet," Thornburgh said.

"The technology doesn't present any problems. The problems lay with human intervention."

"There was only an 18 percent turnout in the primary election this year, so 10 percent of the population decides who wins. You can convince 10 percent of anyone with enough money," he said.

Voter turnout is low because of the lack of contested races, Thornburgh said. Only 29 of 250 potential seats were contested this year.

"You have to ask what incentive there is to represent your population if the elections are uncontested," he said. "I'm not sure if there is one."

Some reasons so many seats are uncontested are the cost of running a successful campaign and the incumbent advantage, he said.

"Incumbents win 97 percent of the time. Without money and name recognition, it's too hard for new people to enter politics," Thornburgh said.

Gerrymandering, the division of a geographic area into voting districts to unfairly favor one party in elections, is also a problem in politics today. Districts that isolate people can push their political ideals to extremes.

"There's no incentive to be bipartisan," Thornburgh said. "This isn't a new problem, but with soundbites playing on TV all day, the partisanship is more visible than it has been in the past."

Thornburgh urged the students to get involved with politics daily, not just to think of themselves as the leaders of tomorrow.

"I hate that phrase. It says that I'm in charge now, and I like it. It'll be your turn when I give you permission. You can't pass leadership along like a half-eaten burrito in a cafeteria," Thornburgh said.

Thornburgh said he speaks to college students every chance he gets. He visits about 10 campuses a year. But while visiting students is important, Thornburgh is careful to make sure his visits don't turn into campaign stops.

"I'm not being flippant when I avoid talking about the race and specific issues in the race; it's not the reason I'm here," Thornburgh said. "Balance helps the education process. You have to let the students decide and participate."

"To talk about race and ethnicity and what those things really are. Just to begin talking to each other."

Cochran said he remembered a song by The Christophers, which said that if everyone lit a candle, the world would be much brighter.

"If we can understand that as a community, then why aren't things better?" he said to the group. "I think we've lit our candles, but we intend to keep them for ourselves. We have to share our candles to make a difference."

Phillips, who will replace Mayor Bruce Snead next year, said it is important for community members to reach out to one another.

"We are a diverse community," he said. "In Manhattan, we are fortunate to have people from all over the world. Diversity brings us together and makes us better. Our diversity will be our strength."

"This is an event to bring a good bunch of community and K-State people together," Peter Wetzel, multicultural assistant and senior in elementary education said. "Manhattan is the home of K-State, but it's also a part of a larger community. We all have a part to play in diversity awareness and creating community."

Wetzel said people need to be aware of diversity, because it affects the community.

"I think that where people come from means a lot to them," he said. "When that is marginalized in any way, it takes away from the community. It separates us. That's not what we want. We need to get to know people, get to know their stories."

CCHW was started in 1998 by Barbara Baker, in part because of an incident at the Bushwacker's Club in Aggieville. A Puerto Rican student group rented the club to celebrate the day of the country's patron saint, San Juan, but club employees put up obscene signs referring to the saint.

"We knew the week would sometimes be controversial, and some people would not understand its intent," Baker said on the CCHW Web site, "but we had faith in the vision that our society can hear and then see truth together, dialogue about solutions together, heal together, and change together."

Candi Hironaka, associate director of Leadership Studies and Programs and event co-chair, said students should attend the week's events to educate themselves.

"People need to attend as many events as they can," she said. "Bring friends. It all starts with education."

PENALTIES | Emotions cause flags for both teams

Sophomore Antwon Moore said the game was full of emotion. The previous two games between K-State and Marshall were decided by a touchdown or less, and last year's game at Marshall ended with a shoving match at midfield.

"This was a big game for us and for coach Prince," Moore said. "We all wanted to go balls-out like we plan on doing all year."

Marshall also had discipline problems, being penalized nine times for 72 yards. The Herd has been penalized 32 times for 291 yards this season.

Taking care of the football also was an issue for both teams.

K-State turned over the ball twice – a lost fumble and an interception – and Marshall had three turnovers – a lost fumble and two interceptions – while each side blocked a punt.

The Wildcats' number of penalties were the most they have received since committing 14 in a 27-25 loss to Nebraska on Nov. 5, 2005. The 116 penalty yards were the most since K-State had 120 in a 31-28 loss to Kansas on Oct. 9, 2004.

"Obviously when you get that many penalties and we're already this far into the season, it's unacceptable," senior running back Thomas Clayton said. "It's something that we don't expect to do."

didn't make plays out wide," Marshall coach Mark Snyder said. "We dropped some balls, and you can't win against a good team like that on the road. That's a pretty good defense we just played. I knew that we were going to struggle up front against their D-line."

Defensive Line's Grade: A-

LINEBACKERS

Entering the season, it was widely known that the Wildcat linebackers would have to be the strength of the defense, and on Saturday that group continued its recent string of solid play.

Brandon Archer and Zach Diles were the only two linebackers on the field for a lot of plays, due to Marshall's consistent use of three wide receiver formations.

Those two harassed Marshall's star running back Ahmad Bradshaw, helping hold him to just 55 yards on the ground.

Diles notched two tackles for loss, including a huge third-down sack of Morris in the fourth quarter with K-State leading 16-7. He said the key to the defense is the chemistry between the defensive line and the linebackers.

"We all know where we're supposed to be, what we're supposed to be doing," Diles said. "We practice hard together. We still have room for improvement, but right now we're a pretty confident bunch out there on defense."

Linebackers' Grade: B+

The Wildcat defense will need to continue to play this well against the tougher competition that lies on the road ahead. Stopping the run and getting consistent pressure on the quarterback will allow the secondary to do what the Cover 2 defense is designed to do: cause turnovers.

As long as players stay healthy, the collective team speed on the front seven should allow K-State to do just that.

"The team speed is very crucial to this defense," Campbell said. "It's hard to play against teams that are fast. It's hard to spread the ball out – hard to get your offense to do what you want it to do."

Florida Atlantic or Marshall – we're still going to dominate. Our defense is fast and physical, our special teams are explosive, and our offense is steady. We're a well-coached, poised program that deserves a spot in the Top 25."

Actual statement: "Our defensive is fast and physical. Our special teams unit is explosive but inconsistent. Our offense is mediocre but shows flashes of potential. We need to clean up the penalties and save our dives for the swimming pool.

But even if we don't play our best game, we can still beat a respectable opponent like Marshall."

The last statement might not remain true next week against Louisville.

Of course, that's probably stating the obvious.

word out, but word of mouth is always the best form of advertising," Carter said.

Other churches have a mix of traditional and contemporary activities for students looking for a fresh atmosphere.

For example, St. Luke's Lutheran Church offers Saturday night services, a traditional Sunday morning service and a contemporary Sunday service.

"We get students coming to all the services," Deacon King Crawford, director of campus ministries, said. "The differences in the services mainly lies in the singing."

Crawford said the traditional service has more of a liturgical, hymnal following, while the contemporary service has newer songs and students who play the piano or guitar.

"We also offer Table Talk after the 11 a.m. contemporary service, where students gather for a home-cooked meal and a discussion," Crawford said. "We talk about what's going on at K-State and how we can bring a Christian perspective into it."

Crawford said the church uses an inclusive approach to getting students to attend.

"We have friends of friends that bring each other along to Bible studies," he said. "All sorts of students come, not only Lutherans. We have Baptist and Catholic students who attend, because I find it hard to turn anyone away."

Dream Jobs

Missy McVicker Dibble, K-State alumna, owner and event planner of White Lily Weddings & Events

■ Location: Shawnee, Kan.

■ Degree: Hotel and restaurant management with a minor in business and an emphasis in event planning

■ Experience: Holiday Inn event planner; premier event planner for The Clubhouse on Baltimore in downtown Kansas City, Mo.; owner and event planner of White Lily Weddings & Events

How did you know you wanted to be an event planner?
I guess I knew really what I wanted to do as far as event planning. It's hard to break into.

How many weddings do you plan each year?
Probably about 60 weddings in a year. About 90 percent of the events I do are weddings, and most are weddings I do in Kansas City.

What helped prepare you for your career?
There are so many facets. A lot of classes I took in hotel and restaurant. At the time, I didn't know why I needed to take all of those classes, but actually some of them have come to be very helpful. I ended up with a business minor, and I hated accounting and other business things, but in your own business, you have to take all of those things upon yourself.

What are some misconceptions about your job as an event planner?
It's not the luxurious lifestyle. I am up at 6 a.m. the day of an event and stay late cleaning up and doing that stuff. You give up all of your weekends. If someone doesn't want to work on the weekends, this might not be the job for them.

What can students do to prepare for this kind of career?
I did a couple of different internships. Internships are great or working with different organizations whether it's planning an event for my sorority or even planning Open House events.

What advice would you give to people interested in a career as an event planner?
I would say, don't hesitate to take risks. I pretty much quit my job and left a safe salary to start my own business because I didn't want to wait until I was 40 to start my own business. Just go for it.

The Flaming Lips debuts UFO, records live CD/DVD in hometown

By Parker Rome
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

OKLAHOMA CITY – If The Flaming Lips hadn't already convinced people that its music was out-there, landing on stage in what appeared to be a UFO certainly won't change anyone's mind.

"I think we've always sort of had this connection with outer space," said Wayne Coyne, lead singer of The Flaming Lips. "There's actually people that think I came from outer space."

The Oklahoma City-based psychedelic, indie rock band, that could be described as a Disney version of Pink Floyd, played to a sold-out home crowd of about 10,000 Friday at the Zoo Amphitheatre.

"It's a cool, historical venue here," Coyne said. "You know, I saw Frank Zappa, The Grateful Dead, Santana and all that stuff in the late '70s here. And to think that The Flaming Lips could play here and sell the place out, and it to be a beautiful night like this, it's just one of those great moments in your life."

Coyne will be able to relive the moment, as the performance was filmed to appear on the Lips' first live CD/DVD set, which will accompany footage recorded July 23 at Los Angeles' Hollywood Bowl. The CD/DVD set is due for release in early 2007.

"I feel good every time I listen to their music," Audriana Tippet-Martelli, Little Rock, Ark., resident, said. "Their shows are fun, and they're all about the fans and getting everybody involved."

Kliph Scurlock, The Flaming Lips drummer, said the band's notoriously vivacious live act is incorporated after the songs are perfected.

"We get the music down first," said Scurlock, who is from Lawrence. "Once we've got the music down, then we add all this ridiculous s---."

To begin the set, the 30-foot lighting rig, designed as a UFO, dropped from the rafters to the stage with smoke machines helping to create the spaceship effect. Scurlock, guitarist Steven Drozd and bassist Michael Ivens descended from the UFO on a ladder. Coyne emerged from the top of the UFO inside what the band refers to as a "space bubble," a human version of a hamster ball. The craft then reared back to provide a light show for the two-hour extravaganza.

"I've been looking for an elaborate entrance for that damn space bubble for a long time, so this really gives me that," Coyne said. "I've just been on the side of the stage blowing it up, leaving it up to the audience to say if it's actually fantastical. Now this, really, in a way, can be fantastical, if I don't fall off the top of it and break my neck or something."

Once Coyne scaled down the side of the UFO inside the bubble, he was welcomed enthusiastically as he stumbled across the supportive hands of crowd members for a brief tour of the audience before he found his way back to the stage.

Coyne said the UFO not only adds to the show, but also helps enhance the mythological image he wants the band to produce.

"A lot of our history is shrouded in drugs and mysticism and weirdness," Coyne said. "I just think that it makes it more powerful. It makes our story just seem more vivid and more dangerous and more believable, because somehow we've become the real thing."

Left: Audience members were chosen to dance on stage in alien costumes and wave flashlights as a UFO descended during The Flaming Lips concert.

THIS WEEK... A look at events that occurred during this week in history, other bizarre holidays, happenings

TODAY 1970: Jimi Hendrix dies

James Marshall "Jimi" Hendrix was a self-taught American musician, singer, songwriter, guitarist, innovator and cultural icon.

Lauded by music fans and critics alike, Hendrix is considered by many to be the most influential and talented electric guitarist in rock music history.

He achieved worldwide fame in 1967 playing at the Monterey Pop Festival, then headlined the iconic 1969 Woodstock Festival before his sudden death in 1970, at the age of 27. To learn more about Hendrix, go to www.jimihendrix.com.

TUESDAY National Play-Doh Day

Play-Doh is a commercial modeling compound similar in texture to bread dough that has been sold as a children's toy around the world for 50 years. It originally was meant to be a wallpaper cleaner. More than 900 million pounds have been sold so far. The product is now owned by American toy giant Hasbro. To celebrate its 50th birthday, the company is selling birthday kits with 50 colors.

WEDNESDAY 1973: Woman wins tennis 'battle of the sexes'

On Sept. 20, 1973, female tennis player Billie Jean King beat Bobby Riggs in a battle of the sexes tennis match. King, originally from Long Beach, Calif., began playing tennis at age 11. She won a record 20 Wimbledon titles and four U.S. Lawn Tennis women's singles championships. She turned professional in 1968. Active in the women's rights movement, particularly in the area of equality of wages, in the 1970s she was one of the founders of the Women's Tennis Association and co-founded a magazine, "Womensport."

THURSDAY 1937: Tolkien's 'Hobbit' published

"The Hobbit" is a novel written by J.R.R. Tolkien in the tradition of the fairy tale. While it also stands in its own right, it is often seen as a prelude to Tolkien's monumental fantasy novel "The Lord of the Rings," which came out 18 years later and has become a box-office smash. "The Hobbit" follows the adventures of hobbit Bilbo Baggins as he travels across the lands of Middle-earth with a band of dwarves and a wizard on a quest to restore a dwarven kingdom and a great treasure stolen by a dragon.

FRIDAY 1995: Turner sells out

In between bankrolling sports franchises and unveiling new cable channels, media mogul Ted Turner sold his broadcasting company to Time Warner Inc.

The deal, initially inked on Sept. 22, 1995, called for Time Warner to hand over $7.5 billion to create one of the world's largest media concerns, flush with roughly $20 billion in assets.

While the merger promised to further pad Turner's coffers, it didn't sit so well with some of his shareholders. To further complicate matters, the Federal Trade Commission began a lengthy investigation centered on the anti-trust implications of the merger, which caused Time Warner's stock to devalue and the deal to shrink to $6.5 billion.

Michael B. Buser, Richard D. Greene and Nancy Caplinger, judges for the Kansas Court of Appeals, listen to court cases Monday morning in Forum Hall in the K-State Student Union.

Court of Appeals judges hear 3 cases as part of Constitution Day activities

By Kristen Roderick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Three classes of elementary and middle school children joined K-State students and Manhattan residents as they watched three court cases by the Kansas Court of Appeals.

The children added humor during the question-and-answer period after the three cases were heard Monday morning in Forum Hall as a part of Constitution Day.

One child asked the three judges, Richard D. Greene, Nancy Caplinger and Michael B. Buser, if the cases were real. After the judges laughed and told the child they were, the child said in disbelief, "Wow."

Another asked the judges why they wear "cloaks" and if they make them hot. They told the child the robes are made of a breathable material.

Greene said he was impressed with the applause the judges received after the hearings.

"We never get applause," Greene said. "We got applause today."

While they were humorous afterward, the children sat quietly as the three cases were presented to the judges.

Greene said the judges came to K-State because they were invited by the provost. It also was the idea of Jacque Butler, assistant university attorney and former clerk for Caplinger.

Heather Reed, assistant dean of student life, said she was excited to have the judges at K-State.

"We jumped to have them come here," she said.

The judges were included in the Constitution Day festivities, Greene said, because the court uses the Constitution on a daily basis.

"We try to do so in a very serious way," he said.

The judges are three of 13 in the Kansas Court of Appeals. A case can be heard by all 13 judges, but it is usually heard by a panel of three.

The first case heard Monday was the State of Kansas v. Carl B. Diggs. According to the synopsis, Diggs was pulled over for failing to use a turn signal. As the highway patrol officer approached the vehicle, he spotted marijuana on the passenger's shirt. Both Diggs and the passenger were arrested, and police searched the vehicle.

Evidence from the search was deemed unconstitutional during the trial, and the state appealed the exclusion of the evidence.

The second case was the State of Kansas v. Jennifer McKone. McKone was pulled over for a noise violation. After witnessing the original driver switch places with McKone, the officer at the scene called for a K9 Unit. He then asked McKone who really had been driving. McKone attempted to call her father, who is an attorney, and by the time she was off the phone, the K9 Unit had arrived.

McKone's attorney came to K-State to appeal her convictions based on illegal search and seizure and misconduct at her trial, according to the synopsis.

The third case was the State of Kansas v. Jaime Raul Lopez III. Lopez was involved in a brawl at Fort

Author delivers controversial lecture on politics

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Forum Hall was filled to capacity last night with people who came to hear Thomas Frank, author of the best-selling book "What's the Matter with Kansas?," discuss controversial political issues.

Those unable to find seating in the lecture hall crowded into the K-State Student Union Courtyard to watch Frank on a projector screen.

Frank gave the first speech of the Lou Douglas Lecture Series on Public Issues, which was co-sponsored by the Donald J. Adamchak Distinguished Lecture Series in Sociology.

Frank began the lecture by displaying charts comparing wages earned by CEOs to those earned by average workers.

He listed the cause of the shift in wages over the years as rejuvenated conservatism, expressed through policies like tax cuts and privatization.

"Conservatism hijacks the language of the angry seekers of justice," Frank said.

Frank said today's world is in a Populist age and explained how that affects the political choices people make.

He listed two main branches of conservatism, culture-war populism and economic populism, and said the two groups encompass different types of individuals and do not overlap.

Boyda says grassroots campaign resonates with voters

Steven Doll | COLLEGIAN

Nancy Boyda, Democratic candidate for U.S. representative in Kansas' second Congressional district, responds to questions from Nick Arena, graduate student in political science, during an interview with KSDB-FM 91.9 Monday in the K-State Student Union.

By Megan Moser
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Nancy Boyda, Democratic candidate for U.S. representative in Kansas' 2nd Congressional district, visited K-State Monday. She spoke to KSDB-FM 91.9 and the Collegian before watching Thomas Frank's Lou Douglas Lecture.

Q: You ran against incumbent Rep. Jim Ryun, R-Kan., in 2004. How is this race going to be different?
A: It is vastly different. First, there isn't a name recognition issue. That whole 'Who is she and is she a credible candidate?' thing isn't there. Also, I think Kansas is different. Everyone is in an entirely different frame of mind.
Q: You had a lot of support from the national party and political action committees in the last election. You raised a total of $1.1 million dollars then, compared with $300,000 so far in this race. What accounts for the difference?
A: Last time, Washington virtually ran this campaign. Big, billion-dollar lobbyists don't control Congress, they own it. They are so far out of touch with reality and middle-class families. That is not a message I think the Democratic party would have me put out.

It is a grassroots effort, and it's working. People are ready for a new message and something that's real. I think when we win, this campaign will make national news. It's based on a connection with the voter.

We don't have a lack of funds. We're not going to spend $600,000 on TV ads that bug people. Voters are interested in learning about the issues. I'm not sure it would have gone over in the last eleciton. We're the only viable campaign not funded out of Washington.
Q: What do you plan to do to support higher education?
A: They cut $13 billion from the school loan program. The most disturbing part is that they won't admit it.

Students deserve the respect to say why tax cuts for the wealthy were more important than school loans for kids. When President Bush came to speak at K-State, someone asked him about loans, and he said, 'You must be mistaken. That can't be right.' But he didn't answer the question. I think students deserve more respect than that.
Q: As they enter the work force, health care is a big concern for college students. What problems do you see with current health care plans, and how does your campaign intend to address them?
A: I will look at any viable plan, whether it is a universal health care plan like they have in Canada or ones like the Massachussetts plan or the California plan. They all have to be looked at.

There is no perfect plan. They all have problems. But doing nothing is the worst thing that can happen to health care.

Forty-seven million Americans uninsured is a moral crisis, but it's now become an economic crisis, because people are still accessing health care. Hospitals, the government, businesses and insurance providers are all trying to find ways to pay for the uninsured.

The number of uninsured people will increase drastically in three to five years. If you look at big business, they don't want change, but sooner or later, it will.
Q: You also have spoken out against tax shifts for the wealthy.
A: Right now I see them saying, 'We're gonna go and squeeze the middle class just a little bit harder.' Meanwhile, really wealthy people get less taxes.

Also, there is a tax shift from huge corporations to the very businesses that are trying to support our families. I'm talking about closing the tax loopholes available to them.
Q: How do you feel about immigration and the current plans for a 10-lane highway across the U.S-Mexico border?
A: There is this corridor being built through Mexico, right through Kansas. Do we want to secure the borders? If so, then why isn't something being done about it? There is nothing being done to secure the borders. That's part of the frustration people are having.

I don't think a big fence is going to solve the problem. We need to have enforceable laws and then enforce them. If you want to know why nothing is being done, I think we can all agree it's about cheap labor.

The problem is the big-money lobbyists want cheap labor, and they virtually control Congress. They're sending a mixed message. It's not any big shock that nothing has been done.
Q: What else do young voters need to know about?
A: There's an elephant in the room that nobody will talk about, and that is the draft. Young people ought to be at the very center of that discussion. There is a global war on terror. Young people ought to be saying, 'How are we going to fund this, and who is going to fight it?' I hope young people are asking questions, because no one in either party wants to talk about it.

The global war on terror is not going to be over any time soon, and it will impact your lives. Not having that conversation is doing people a disservice. I am committed to a strong, strong military. I'm going to do everything I can to keep (the draft) voluntary.

Bush, Congress and the ugly(er) truth

White House has few options left of how to handle proposals for Guantanamo Bay prisoners

Help. Run. Fear and distress. Washington, D.C., grapples with difficult issues. The end is near.

JONAS HOGG

The increasingly rheumatic Bush administration seems cramped as more of the GOP bulwarks rail against the White House proposal concerning what can be done to our extended guests at Guantanamo Bay, what can be brought to trial and what the accused can know about.

Pundits missing half their brain toss around torture and what evil and wretched things we are doing to our fellow man. Then pundits missing the other half assure us we're doing what we must, and it simply can't be avoided.

The military – well aware that whatever it says will bite it in the back side – has wisely kept its trap shut.

The Bushes now have few options left in front of them.

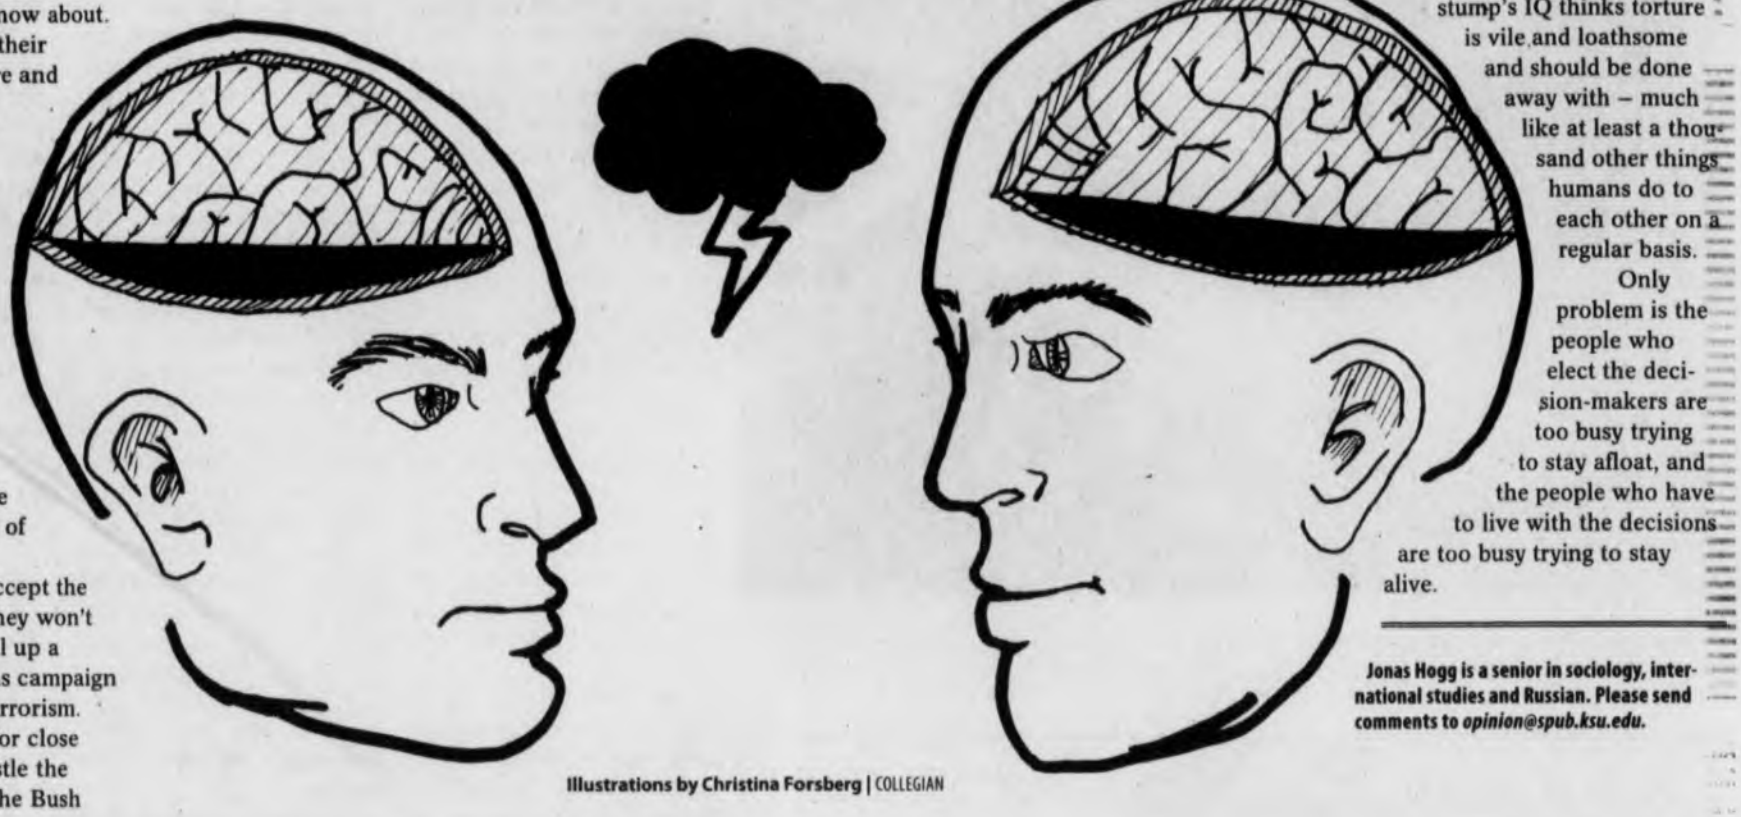
They can cave and accept the new proposals, which they won't do because it would foul up a five-year public-relations campaign about being tough on terrorism.

Or they could hope for close midterm elections to jostle the Republicans back into the Bush camp, which they won't hope for because if the Republicans lose big in November, the new Democratic Congress will have us giving brisk foot rubs for interrogations and the Bush administration knows it.

Or there is the choice to delay until this year's World Series, which they will do because the average American at that time has the attention span of a hyperactive kid in a Pixy Stick plant.

Furthermore, the White House is well aware that most Americans simply don't care about what happens to the away team's players. Between kids, a job, a mortgage, inflating currency, declining economy and a million other immediate problems, Ozzie and Harriet can't muster the strength to care about supposed Bad Guy X cooped up in Cuba and what misfortune has fallen upon him, because someone's got to pay these bills.

As for the military – it especially doesn't care. Guantanamo, and certainly Baghdad, are a long way from D.C.'s moral posturing. If a military interrogator is brought a prisoner caught planting IEDs, that interrogator is going to find out where other IEDs are. Interrogators are going to find out who is supplying the material for IEDs. They're going to find out who recruited this guy to plant IEDs.



They're going to find it out because men and women, husbands and wives, mothers and fathers, brothers and sisters and countless others are depending on them to find out. They're going to find out because a box marked, "Remains: Do Not View," is a sorry gift to give a sobbing widow.

Colin Powell might not like the White House's proposal, but he knows the truth. John McCain might despise the White House's efforts to relax the Geneva Convention, but after three years in a North Vietnamese prison camp you can damn well believe he knows the truth.

Everyone with a tree stump's IQ thinks torture is vile and loathsome and should be done away with – much like at least a thousand other things humans do to each other on a regular basis.

Only problem is the people who elect the decision-makers are too busy trying to stay afloat, and the people who have to live with the decisions are too busy trying to stay alive.

Racial television promotes competition between ethnicities

ALEX PEAK

The latest season of "Survivor" shuffles 20 contestants out to the Cook Islands, near New Zealand and separates them into teams divided by race. These tribes consist of whites, blacks, Asians and Hispanics.

As citizens of the United States, we learn to embrace and adapt to the different cultures within our nation. Our diversity is one of the things that makes us distinct.

The TV series "Survivor" has been fairly successful during its past 12 seasons, but what makes the production team think its racially discriminating brainchild will make the show more popular? It must be desperate for ratings.

As a national community, we try to teach children not to hate or judge people who are different than us. All the while, a network like CBS comes out with a primetime show like this one and makes getting the message to our youth that much harder. We need to make sure children understand that prejudice is bad and cultural diversity is good. Alienating cultures and pitting them against each other in a game of survival is not a suggestion kids need to pick up.

As far as the show is concerned, what happens as the season progresses and the teams develop pride in their own team (or race, essentially) and hostility toward other teams (again, races)? We cannot demonstrate that every individual is equal when one race's team does better than another. Or even worse, what will happen at the end of the season when one team wins? Is the winning team supposed to be the "ultimate survivor," better than all of the other races?

Reality television by its very nature often is something to laugh about. Who takes programs like "Wife Swap," "Big Brother," "The Real World," "The Hills," "Nanny 911," etc., seriously? These shows are brainless but mostly harmless. However, a reality show like "Cook Island" already is causing racial slurs and discrimination that goes against the American way.

Although CBS apparently won Thursday night ratings with the "Cook Island" premiere, many people are outraged by the show. For example, according to the Fox News Channel, New York City councilman John Liu said he wanted to start a campaign to insist CBS take the show off the air.

"The idea of having a battle of the races is preposterous," Liu said on the Fox News Web site.

Reality television shows portraying how morbidly obese people exercise and change their lifestyles to lose weight or following the dramatic lives of high school students are one thing, but a show that divides people by their ethnicity and skin color and makes them compete against each other seems unethical.

Consumers must practice food safety to protect themselves from bacteria

Often, food is taken for granted. We assume what we get is safe to eat. It is the responsibility of food distributers to make sure our food is not contaminated with diseases like E. coli. However, that does not mean that we, as consumers, should passively munch on foods without thinking of our safety.

Although this recent outbreak is all over the news, including the Collegian, this is not the first time E. coli or another food-borne illness has been found where it should not be.

That is why consumers should practice food safety.

It might seem obvious, but washing an apple before you eat it can help protect you from diseases. Although we learn about washing our fruits and vegetables, sometimes we don't practice what we learn and think nothing will happen if we skip that obvious – but essential – step.

Unfortunately, washing infected spinach won't protect us from E. coli. This incident highlights how important it is to protect ourselves.

But don't panic. Fruits and vegetables are still essential parts of a healthy diet. Just because one vegetable is recalled does not mean we can't enjoy other fresh fruits and veggies. So munch on – safely.

Spinach recalled after discovery of E. coli infection

By Kristina Monroe-Lowe
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Fresh spinach is being removed from store shelves after the Food and Drug Administration reported 113 cases of E. coli infection.

The E. coli has been traced to fresh spinach from Natural Selection Foods, a company based in San Juan Bautista, Calif. All of Natural Selection Foods' brands of spinach have been recalled, as well as brands from other companies that had contracts with Natural Selection Foods to produce or package their spinach.

In total, the company has recalled 34 brands. Additional companies are expected to issue recalls of their brands in the next few days.

Natural Selection Foods reports its organic produce has been cleared by health officials of any contamination. However, it did not lift any recalls of its organic brands.

All spinach and prepackaged salad mixes containing spinach also were pulled from store shelves with no word on when new shipments would arrive. The growing season for spinach ends in November in most areas of the country.

The strain of E. coli found in the California spinach – E. coli 0157:H7 – can cause diarrhea, often with bloody stools. Most healthy adults will be free of symptoms in about a week; however, some people could develop Hemolytic Uremic Syndrome.

HUS is a form of kidney failure most likely to occur in young children and the elderly. This condition can lead to death.

Dr. Doug Powell, associate professor of diagnostic medicine pathobiology and scientific director of the Food Safety Network at K-State, is involved with the latest E. coli outbreak.

"People need to stop treating this as if it is a new thing. It's not a new thing," Powell said. "Ten of the 19 cases of food-borne illnesses since 1995 have come from the same area in California."

Powell also said that since 1993 there have been 25 outbreaks of pathogenic E. coli linked to fresh lettuce and spinach.

The World Health Organization estimates that 30 percent of the population, roughly one in four people, will contract food-borne illnesses every year. Five thousand of those will die from the disease they contracted.

"Fresh fruits and vegetables, not just spinach, are the most significant source of food-borne illness today in the U.S.," Powell said. "People are paying attention now because it is happening now. This will be a very large outbreak; it's what we call a tipping point."

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention warns that while boiling or cooking spinach can kill the bacteria, washing the vegetable won't eliminate it.

Some students have questioned whether it is more dangerous to eat fresh fruits and vegetables than it is beneficial to one's health.

"That's a tough one," Powell said. "Instead of it being either/or, we need to take advantage of a diet rich in fresh fruits and vegetables while constantly taking steps to ensure our safety."

Powell said those steps begin on the farm.

"The farm is the first line of defense," he said. "Guidelines are a first step, but we need more creative ways to compel everyone, from the person harvesting the spinach to the person distributing the spinach, to take food safety seriously, even in the absence of an outbreak."

Judges' panel answers questions

Answering questions from moderator John Fliter, associate professor of political science, three judges from the Kansas Court of Appeals — Michael Buser, Richard Greene and Nancy Caplinger — participate in a panel discussion in Forum Hall. The discussion was part of the Constitution Day celebration on Monday.

Discussion focuses on judicial review, constitution

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Wearing "I heart the Constitution" buttons, three judges from the Kansas Court of Appeals answered questions Monday in Forum Hall of the K-State Student Union.

The question-and-answer period was part of Constitution Day celebrations and featured presiding judge Richard D. Greene with judges Nancy Caplinger and Michael B. Buser.

Introducing the judges was John Carlin, former Kansas governor and visiting professor of political science, who discussed the move of the Constitution to the Smithsonian Museum.

"The Constitution is not an artifact," he said. "It's not something you go and look at, like the Hope diamond."

John Fliter, associate professor of political science, was moderator for the discussion on judicial review and constitutional democracy.

Discussing the process through which judges are selected, Caplinger said she had gone through the selection process several times but refused to give up.

"It's kind of viewed as a badge of honor," she said.

About 50 percent of judges in Kansas are appointed, and 50 percent are chosen through an electoral process, the panel said.

The problem with being elected to the Court of Appeals instead of going through the selection process is the bias of the process, the judges said.

"There is an appearance there (of bias)," Buser said.

Greene agreed, saying being elected might lead to the impression that a certain judge might be partial to a campaign contributer, instead of trying a case on its merits.

"If you're not fair, and you're not impartial, you don't deserve to be a judge," Buser said.

The judges on the panel were selected by the governor at their individual times of appointment.

Drum act begins cultural week

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The sound of drums could be heard as Richard Pitts and the Wonder Workshop Roots of Rhythm performed for a large crowd in the K-State Student Union Courtyard Monday.

"For me, it's therapy," Sylvia Beeman, artist and Manhattan resident, said.

The performance was the opening reception for Community Cultural Harmony Week.

Pitts engaged the audience with motivational chants, telling listeners that everyone is a drum for equal rights.

"My mom told me when I was coming up, 'Make a difference, boy,'" Pitts said.

Pitts and band members Beeman; Elizabeth Johnson, senior in graphic design; Theodore Bunch, sophomore in environmental design; and Patty Brown-Barnett, associate pastor for programs at First United Methodist Church; played songs, including "When the Saints Go Marching In," pounding their drums to Pitts' chants.

"We're drum majors for equal rights," Pitts said.

Other events planned for Cultural Harmony Week include a dialogue on religion at noon Tuesday in the Union Courtyard during which representatives from Christian, Jewish, Muslim and Hindu religions will speak.

There also will be a documentary film about a New Orleans coffee house open to people of all races in the 1960s, titled "the Quorum," at 7 p.m. Wednesday in Forum Hall.

Clara Reyes, publisher of the Kansas City bilingual newspaper "Dos Mundos," will speak about windows of the world through bilingual print media at 10:30 a.m. Thursday in Forum Hall.

The week will end with the Community Cultural Harmony Week Banquet at noon Friday in the Union Ballroom.

6-month-old band The Ruckus releases computer-mixed 1st album to full house Saturday

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Local band The Ruckus released its debut album, "Get Serious," Saturday night, playing to a packed house at P.J.'s Bar in Aggieville. Playing in a high-energy, upbeat style known as ska, The Ruckus fuses the sounds of horn instruments like trumpets and trombones with traditional rock and punk elements.

The members formed the band in April 2006 and spent much of the summer in the studio producing the debut entirely on their own. Hubbel explained the intricacies of the recording process.

"We started recording around mid-June," he said, "We built a studio in Jeff (Brown)'s house, recorded each of our musical parts separately, and then, using an Adobe computer program, two of our members mixed the record.

"We wanted to name the album 'Two months of our blood, sweat and sanity,' but 'Get Serious' just had a better ring to it."

In contrast to the album's "serious" title, the inside booklet's artwork features Istas and Brown fighting, clad in plaid suits and chicken and rabbit costume heads.

"Since we were naming the album 'Get Serious,' we wanted to come up with the most ridiculous image we could think of, and one member of the band suggested guys in animal suits fighting," Hubbel said.

"The show was really exciting," he said. "With all the people jumping and dancing on the floor, you could feel the entire place move. The energy was really great."

Former band member Mike Higgins, who recently left the band to pursue a graduate degree in mathematics from University of California-Berkeley, returned from the West Coast to help the band celebrate its accomplishment and even took the stage for a few numbers.

"It's good to be back and see my friends and family," Higgins said. "The recording process included long days and many frustrations, so I'm glad to see it all come together."

Paden Town, junior in music education and trombone player, plays a song along with the other band members Saturday night.

Jeff Brown, junior in music education and lead vocalist and trumpet player; Nate Edwards, sophomore in mechanical engineering and trumpet player; and Aly Denines, senior in mathematics and tenor saxophone player, shout as they perform Saturday night.

Local band The Ruckus succumbs to genre formula in every track

THE RUCKUS
"GET SERIOUS"
GRADE: B-
Reviewed by Mark Sibilla

"The Ruckus is a high-energy, nine-member ska band," at least according to a press release from the Manhattan-based band.

Whoa, wait a minute – a ska band? I don't know if I'm the right person to review "Get Serious," the band's self-produced debut album.

I truly doubt my ability to review this album (and I'm sure most readers of the Collegian doubt my ability to properly review any album), because I don't have the best relationship with ska music.

Ska, like almost all genres of music, has some redeeming qualities. I love some of the originators of the Jamaican-based genre, like Desmond Dekker and Toots & The Maytails. I also enjoy some of the second wave ska/punk bands on the 2 Tone label, like The Specials and English Beat, but that is where I draw the line.

Perhaps my distaste for ska stems from the crappy ska-based Christian bands I listened to in my "born-again Christian" phase in high school. Perhaps it's the bastardization of the music as it has evolved over the years to reach a mass pop audience.

Whatever the cause, the effect is quite clear: my relationship with ska music is rather frosty, and as some married couples could tell you, all the Viagra in the world won't help if no flame remains.

So here I am, sitting at my computer, trying to review "Get Serious." I honestly wish I could heap praise upon this album, but with every spin, nothing does anything to get a rise out of me.

Sure, there are parts that are out of the ordinary, but each track eventually succumbs to the ska formula.

Take the opening track, "The Noise." It begins with a racing hi-hat rhythm, joined by a beautifully subdued synthesizer melody. There is some unexpected guitar feedback, and finally, the horn section builds to a crescendo that gives way to the anticlimax of the usual ska trademarks: off-beat hi-hat hits, a rhythm guitar that doesn't do much more than keep the tempo, and a chorus of horns that provide a majority of the hooks for each song.

All of the musicians in The Ruckus are technically skilled on their instruments. They are all great people (reading the liner notes, I learned I even have some personal friends in the band), and I can tell the band had a blast recording this album. But this album just doesn't do it for me.

It seems that all the things The Ruckus has to offer musically, I can find in other artists.

I must give this (clichéd) disclaimer with this review: take it with a grain of salt. If you enjoy free-spirited ska bands that unabashedly play their hearts out, I am sure you will enjoy The Ruckus. It just doesn't push my buttons. But, hey, I'm just a pretentious jerk who reviews music for a college newspaper and who really likes the new Justin Timberlake album.

So what the hell do I know?

Butterflies visit K-State during migratory flight

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Monarch butterflies from Canada have stopped at K-State during their migratory flight to Mexico, said Jim Nechols, professor and interim head of the Department of Entomology.

"They're coming from everywhere," Nechols said.

Manhattan has its own resident monarch population, because the monarchs have a food supply here, and the K-State University Gardens have plenty of milkweed to provide them a breeding ground.

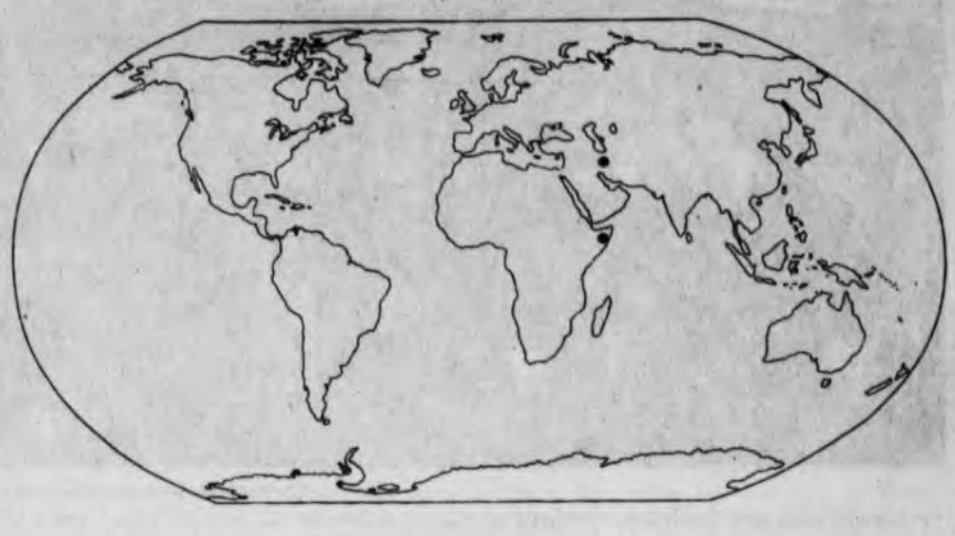
Orley "Chip" Taylor, director of Monarch Watch from the University of Kansas, said monarchs are drawn to milkweed because the larvae feed on the plant exclusively.

"Most farmers have land that cannot be used for crops," he said. "These lands could be set aside for wildlife, including monarchs, by encouraging the growth of milkweeds."

Taylor said the growth of milkweeds in conservation reserve program landscapes, particularly those that will be out of rotation for more than two years, should be encouraged.

Monarch Watch teaches people how to build a monarch way-station, an intermediate stop between stations on a line of travel, according to the Monarch Watch Web site.

"Monarchs need resource patches – lots of them – and our goal over the next three years is the creation of at least 10,000 of these patches, which we are calling monarch way-stations," the Web site states.



Nechols said milkweed, although it is a weed, is not a threat to farmers' crops and won't adversely affect crops next to a resource patch.

"Milkweed is not on the state noxious weed list," Nechols said.

Farmers can set aside land for monarchs without endangering other crops, Nechols said, because milkweed doesn't spread freely like some weeds.

41 KILLED IN LATEST IRAQ VIOLENCE

BAGHDAD, Iraq – Bombers and gunmen killed at least 41 people and wounded dozens across Iraq Monday, while parliament leaders again put off debate on legislation that some Iraqis fear could threaten the country's unity and bring even more violence.

The U.S. military relinquished control of a second Iraqi army division as Iraqi officials prepare to further tighten security ahead of the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, when insurgent attacks tend to spike.

In a positive development for Iraq's leaders, predominantly Sunni Arab tribes in a volatile western province have joined to fight insurgents in the region, and want the government and the U.S.-led coalition to supply them with weapons, a tribal leader said.

Tribal leaders and clerics in Ramadi, capital of violent Anbar province, met last week and set up a force of about 20,000 men.

These men were "ready to purge the city of these infidels," Sheik Fassal al-Guood, a tribal leader from Ramadi, told the Associated Press.

"People are fed up with the acts of those criminals who take Islam as a cover for their crimes," he said. "The situation in the province is unbearable, the city is abandoned, most of the families have fled the city and all services are poor."

WITNESS TESTIFIES OF HUSSEIN CHEMICAL WEAPON ATTACK

BAGHDAD, Iraq – A former Kurdish rebel testified Monday he temporarily lost his sight in a chemical weapons attack by Saddam Hussein's forces nearly two decades ago. He removed his glasses so the court could see his swollen eyes.

Karawan Abdellah said he still lives in "pain and suffering" from the March 1988 attack, when Iraqi warplanes raided Kurdish guerrilla positions in the northern village of Shanakhesiya.

After the initial airstrike, Iraq fired chemical weapons on the village, Abdellah said.

"I stayed in a hospital for six months, and during this period I wasn't able to see at all," he testified. "When I take off my glasses in front of my children, they tell me to wear them again because they get scared of the way my eyes look."

SOMALIAN PRESIDENT AVOIDS ASSASSINATION

MOGADISHU, Somalia – Somalia's president narrowly escaped an assassination attempt Monday by a suicide car bomber outside the parliament building in Baidoa, officials said. The blast and a subsequent gunbattle left 11 people dead, including the president's brother.

There was no immediate claim of responsibility for the attack, which Foreign Minister Ismail Mohamed Hurre said was the first in Somalia by a suicide bomber.

"This has the fingerprints of al-Qaeda all over it," Hurre told The Associated Press in Nairobi, Kenya.

If it is linked to an Islamic militia that has seized control of much of southern Somalia, it could cause peace talks between the two sides to fall apart.

FRANK | Speaker discusses 2 forms of populism

Christopher Hanewinckel | COLLEGIAN

Students, faculty and Manhattan residents sit in the overflow section of the K-State Student Union Courtyard and listen to the lecture by Thomas Frank. Spectators filled Forum Hall, the Courtyard and various spots on the upper two floors of the Union.

"The one thing they have in common is that they're Populist and claim to speak for the little guy," Frank said.

Frank used cartoons and examples of different mediums to describe economic populism, discussing markets and their previous high expectations. He also discussed how he feels that conservatives have an anti-intellectual perspective.

"Intellectuals are always fools, according to new economy thinking, and common people are brilliant," he said.

When discussing culture-war populism, Frank talked about the separation of class and the idea of a liberal elite.

"To believe in culture-war, it is an extremely pessimist view that your side cannot win," he said.

Frank said there is a much greater shift to the right that started with two factions, the traditional businessmen and the working class.

He said there has been a conservative revival for the first group, but the second group has experienced disappointment.

"All they have to show is lower wages and dirtier jobs," Frank said. "The charm for Republicans should have worn off for these guys."

A question-and-answer period followed the lecture. Students, faculty and other attendees asked Frank about such topics as the education system and the need for changes in the Democratic party in order to win elections.

Jennifer Lyon, senior in history and political science, questioned Frank about his views on conservative Kansans.

"I can't pretend that I didn't agree with everything he had to say," Lyon said.

She said she thought Frank stereotyped rural areas of Kansas and said while he spoke about how conservatives attack liberals, he was doing the same thing in return, as a liberal to conservatives.

Frank later denied having stereotyped Kansans and said he had done several hours of interviews with different people.

"I don't feel like I'm stereotyping anyone, and I've tried to be fair," he said.

Matt Groneman, staff assistant for education and personal development, asked Frank about his views on third parties and if they are a viable option. Frank responded that third parties have a long and important history in the United States that ended with Populism.

"He gave the answer I expected, knowing all there is against third parties," Groneman said.

Groneman said he agreed with a lot of what Frank said but thought Frank ignored changes in economic and religious rhetoric.

Nancy Boyda, Democratic candidate for the second Congressional district of Kansas, spoke during the question-and-answer period about coming from a conservative family and about criticism she's received for not asking money for her campaign from people and organizations in Washington, D.C.

In an interview about the lecture's content, Boyda later said, "David is beating Goliath. Grassroots democracy is beating big money."

Davis said he thought Frank over-exaggerated many topics in his speech, including the discussion of intellectuals and value-voters.

"He's not offering any ideas," Davis said. "He's talking about things that people have been talking about for years, yet not offering any alternatives."

Frank signed copies of "What's the Matter with Kansas?," which were available to purchase after the lecture.

CASES | Verdicts to be available in 4-6 weeks

However, the individual who was stabbed did not know it happened until later.

Lopez was the only one seen with a knife, and the knife had peanut butter on it, as did the wound.

Lopez's attorney came to K-State because he said he believed there was not enough evidence presented to prove guilt in the first trial.

The verdicts in all three cases will be available to the public in four to six weeks. The cases will either be retried with a new jury, or the judges will dismiss the cases and uphold the original trial ruling.

Alfred Cochran, assistant provost, said he hopes the Kansas Court of Appeals will hear another trial at K-State in the future.

"We'd be delighted if they'd be interested," he said.

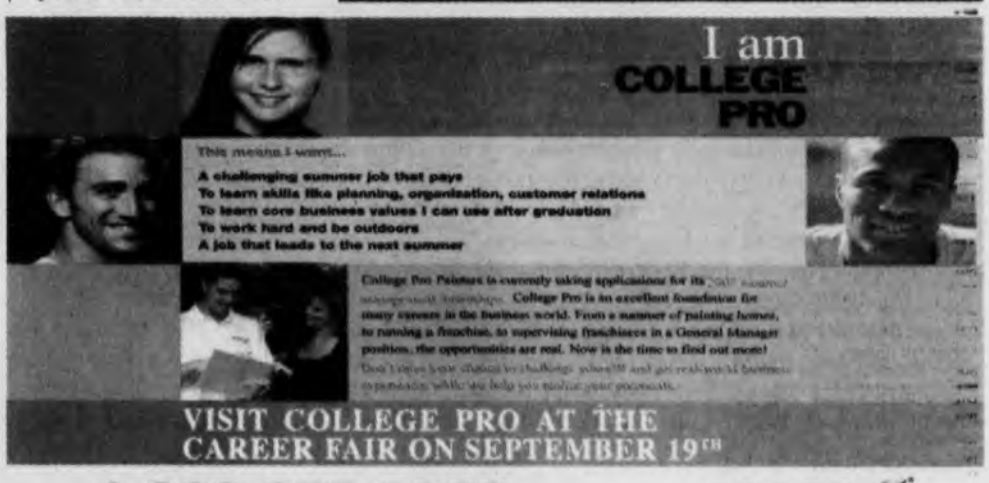
of the Riley County Police Department said.

The K-State Department of Intercollegiate Athletics had no comment but said coach Ron Prince will speak on the matter at his press conference today.

Norwood was arrested shortly after midnight Sunday in the K-State Student Union parking lot.

"He did not fight the officers," Capt. Richard Herrman of the campus police said.

Norwood was part of two small groups in the south Union parking lot who were bantering back and forth, Herrman said. When officers arrived, he refused to cooperate, and the campus police had to physically put him in the police car, Herrman said.



Norwood's passive resistance led to the obstruction charge, Herrman said.

The charges of disorderly conduct stemmed from Norwood's refusal to stop shouting obscenities at another person after officers arrived.

Norwood's first court appearance will be 8 a.m. Oct. 3.

Kansas wineries slow to offer online purchasing

By Steve Brisendine
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BASEHOR, Kan. – Like a bottle of Cabernet Sauvignon – or, more regionally, Chambourcin or Cynthiana – online commerce for Kansas wineries could take some time to reach its potential.

Since July 1, it has been legal for the state's wineries to take Internet and mail orders and to ship their products both within and outside Kansas, with some restrictions.

You wouldn't know it from their Web sites, though. While several wineries have filled such orders, none of them yet provides a way to order a bottle or case with the click of a mouse.

The latter scenario applies at Basehor's Holy-Field Vineyard and Winery, on the western edge of the Kansas City metropolitan area, where a warm Friday afternoon found a steady stream of regulars chatting with tasting room manager Mandy Hampton and carrying out bottles made from estate-grown grapes.

"It would be good customer service to be able to do that," Hampton said of online sales. "But we have limited production. This is a boutique, handcrafted product."

Dozier Vineyards and Winery, in the central Kansas town of Ellinwood, also is a small-volume operation with an annual production of about 2,000 gallons, or 8,000 bottles.

The winery has shipped several cases out of state, though, to visitors who placed orders on-site.

"If a person is standing here wanting the wine shipped home, we can ship it anywhere," winemaker Bruce Dozier said. "We've had a few, mostly California people who come in here and want it shipped back."

Still, Dozier wouldn't mind doing more business online, even if it never amounts to more than a small percentage of his business.

But advertise it?

"Not at this point," Dozier said. "If they ever get it to where it's smoother and not so cumbersome, I'm sure we will. At this point, it would take a full-time bookkeeper just to keep up with these laws."

Any winery wanting to ship to another state must obtain a license in that state. Doing so, winemaker Norm Jennings said, can be a long, involved process.

"Although we've been cleared, finally, by the state to do it, now we've got to play catch-up," said Jennings, general manager of the Smoky Hills Vineyards & Winery in Salina. "We've got to submit to a lot of states to get licenses to get into those states."

In some cases, Jennings said, other states present few obstacles.

"California permits are $10. They say, 'Fill out an application and give us a copy of your state and federal license and a copy of your board meeting minutes where you authorized out-of-state shipments,'" he said. "Right now, we're already able to ship to some states that don't require a permit at all. Those states, boom, opened right up to us."

Other states require more paperwork, and licensing fees ranging as high as $500.

But while the process can be unwieldy, Dozier said, it beats not being able to ship at all.

"It's definitely an improvement over what we had," he said. "It gets your foot in the door to make things better."

Kansas, which also permits shipments from out-of-state wineries under the new law, has a relatively low licensing threshold.

A winery wanting to ship to Kansas must pay a $50 fee, fill out a one-page application and submit a copy of its license.

Tom Groneman, director of the Kansas Department of Revenue's alcoholic beverage control and inspection unit, said 11 wineries already have obtained licenses to ship to Kansas.

Nine are from California, he said, with one each from Washington and Oregon.

Kansas wineries also are allowed to fill in-state mail or online orders, but buyers must pick the wine up at a liquor store – a provision inserted to keep deliveries from going to minors.

Only two of the state's 19 wineries have applied for in-state shipping licenses, Groneman said.

Vince Papale's story of prevailing through open tryouts inspires movie

By Jeffrey Rake
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

There was a time when Vince Papale, a 30-year-old bartender living in Philadelphia, would attend every Eagles home game at the old Veteran's Stadium. He watched passionately, always staying until the end, as the Eagles played miserably from the late 1960s to the mid-1970s.

The Eagles never made the postseason from 1961 to 1975, and the city of "Brotherly Love" was growing impatient with its favorite sports franchise.

At a time of economic depression, when jobs were difficult to come by and the Vietnam War was in full swing, the Eagles were what the city turned to for hope, confidence and something to root for.

The Eagles provided Philadelphia with none of that, as they consistently fielded losing teams and changed coaches five times during a 15-year stretch.

In 1976, the Eagles hired coach Dick Vermeil, who was given the near-impossible task of turning around the franchise. Shortly after taking the job, Vermeil decided to make a bold move, one many Philadelphians considered a publicity stunt.

He decided to have an open tryout for anyone who thought he could make the team.

Papale, who had several problems of his own – his wife left him, his job status was up in the air, he had personal troubles – decided to take a chance. He knew it was time to make something of himself, and the opportunity Vermeil provided was too good to pass up.

A man who never played collegiate football, Papale arrived at the stadium where he had spent every Sunday as a fan, this time as a player.

Papale came to the open practice motivated, and he displayed an uncanny work ethic. He hustled, played with energy and ended up being one of the few men who caught Vermeil's attention.

"Anytime you get chances, you have to deliver," Papale said. "You have to make yourself noticed, and, in some cases, you have to stand up when people are telling you to sit down."

Vermeil was impressed with Papale's speed and natural ability, and he decided Papale would be the only member of the open tryout to receive an invite to training camp.

Though many of the Eagles players didn't take Papale seriously, they couldn't deny he outworked them. It was obvious how badly Papale wanted to make the team, and he would do anything he could to showcase his talents.

"A bunch of receivers at Eagles training camp, once they caught the ball, they would just sort of stop and flip the ball to the coach," Papale said. "Well, in my case, I would just sprint 30, 40 yards downfield, and it caught not only the attention of the coaches, but it caught the attention of the fans in the stands."

As word spread around Philadelphia that Papale was making strides in training camp, the city began to rally behind him, cheering on his successes. At a time when the movie "Rocky" was being filmed, Papale became the real-life Rocky. He was the unlikely hero, trying to beat the odds and accomplish the unthinkable.

"They wanted to ride with it, and I wanted to take them with me," Papale said. "I wanted to play for the team that I had cheered for and the team that I was a season ticket-holder for."

Each week of training camp brought new player cuts, and Papale survived them. But he knew he had to raise his level of play if he was to make the last cut and the team. He also knew every play in practice was being filmed, and he constantly was being evaluated.

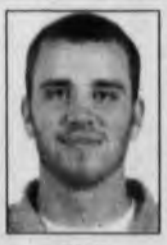
That inspired him to press on, to make the most of his opportunity, and somehow to find a way onto the roster.

"You just can't let up at all, because if you let something slip through the cracks, there is somebody else who will just come and try to take that chance away from you," Papale said.

In the end, Papale made the final cut and earned a spot as a special-teams player. He overcame the odds and did what many people thought he couldn't do.

His story inspired the movie "Invincible," which opened in theaters Aug. 25 and spent two weeks as the box office's No. 1 movie.

For Papale, it is a dream come true.



"I'm the luckiest guy in the world right now," he said. "You have no idea what it's like to have a movie made about yourself."

Papale said he wants people to understand the true message of the movie, a message that has little to do with football.

"When people walk away from it, I want them to say, 'You know what? This reminds me of something that went on in my life ... and the next time I have a challenge, I'm going to do it the same way, because I'll be able to overcome it.'"

Royals need to start losing again to get 1st draft pick

Now that the Kansas City Royals are completely out of anything resembling a playoff race – and have been for quite some time – the team is starting to play good baseball.

NICK DUNN

At press time, the Royals were 9-6 in September and have posted an 11-7 record in their last 18 games. That doesn't sound like much, but spread over the 162-game season, that would result in a 99-63 record – a good record for anyone, especially the laughing-stock of the league.

The crazy part is that Kansas City is playing against teams trying to make the playoffs. In the past month, the Royals have posted series wins over the Minnesota Twins, Chicago White Sox and the Boston Red Sox.

All of this is great. Kansas City seems finally to have mastered the art of being terrible when games are important but somehow found a way to be good when the games are meaningless.

The Royals need to stop this nonsense or somebody important in baseball might actually mistake them for a real team. This cannot happen.

In addition, because of this stupid run of good games the team has assembled, it is out of last place in all of baseball – half a game ahead of the Tampa Bay Devil Rays.

What are they thinking? If they keep going at this pace, the Royals will not receive the No. 1 pick in the 2007 Amateur Draft.

Granted, having the No. 1 pick in baseball isn't as important as in other sports, but some years it is.

Take, for instance, the 1993 draft. A guy named Alex Rodriguez was taken No. 1 by the Seattle Mariners. He turned out to be a decent major league player. The four players taken after A-Rod? Darren Dreifort, Brian Anderson, Wayne Gomes and Jeff Granger – not exactly household names.

Someone in the Royals organization needs to take control now, before this situation gets too out of hand.

I suggest hiring crazy ex-manager Tony Peña for the remainder of the season. Have him come up with some silly Spanish slogan like "Burritos Gratis para Todos" (Free Burritos for Everyone), or "Me Duelen Los Dedos" (My Fingers Hurt). As long as it doesn't make any sense, it should do the trick.

Maybe someone in public relations could come up with a promotion in which the first 1,000 kids under age 12 are entered into a drawing to pitch the first three innings of that night's game.

Or the Royals could put inflatable human figures in every seat and then blast some fake crowd noise over the speakers. That way the players would mistakingly think people showed up to watch them play.

These are just suggestions. There's still time to correct this situation, and someone needs to step up and do just that.

Staff Reports

Where to watch the Wildcats this season

Old Chicago Report Card:
Atmosphere: B
Food selection: A
Drink (choices): A
Entertainment: A

Blending great food, good entertainment and a drink selection second to none, Old Chicago is one of the best places in Manhattan to catch a K-State game.

Old Chicago, 100 Manhattan Town Center, burst on to the Manhattan scene last year and blew local bars away with its 110-item World Beer Tour. Add to that a full-service bar, and it is apparent Old Chicago is the place to go for the avid beer connoisseur.

For those more interested in food than drinks, Old Chicago is still a good choice. Unlike most bars, Old Chicago offers a complete menu. High-quality appetizers, soups and salads, desserts and entrées — featuring both Italian and traditional American items — ensure there is something for every taste and price range.

If the food and drink aren't reason enough to give Old Chicago a chance on game day, the entertainment selection should be. Spread throughout the restaurant are 13 high-resolution televisions, including four flat screens above the bar. Additionally, Old Chicago subscribes to several sports packages which guarantees that if K-State is on television anywhere, it will be on at Old Chicago.

There also is a good selection of alternative entertainment. Located throughout the restaurant's ridiculously spacious bar area are several arcade games, a pool table and a jukebox.

The only aspect in which Old Chicago is lacking is atmosphere. Because it is a chain restaurant, it has a difficult time rivaling local bars in terms of K-State memorabilia, but it still is classy and fits the football atmosphere well.

CBK | Nation's top high school recruit scheduled to visit

The nation's top ranked prospect, Michael Beasley, committed to play for Bob Huggins and K-State in June without having visited Manhattan. Now the 6-foot-9, 235-pound power forward is set to make his official visit to Manhattan this weekend, according to Brian Gates of Rivals.com.

Beasley

"I've been set to come visit, and I'm still planning on being there this weekend," Beasley said. "I called Coach Huggins a week ago or so and talked to him. Nothing really new to talk about. He was curious how things are going for me as I was getting set to pick my high school and stuff."

Beasley decided earlier this month to finish his high school career at Notre Dame Preparatory School in Finchburg, Mass.

"I am here at Notre Dame," he said. "It is cool. It is nice. It's a good school. I looked at a few places and just decided this one was the best place for me to be for my last year."

Beasley said calls from college recruiters have ebbed but haven't stopped completely.

"Hopefully the coaches are getting the idea that I'm committed to K-State. I tell them that, and I'm not going to change my mind. I'll just continue to tell the ones that call that I've made my choice, and at some point they'll start to believe me."

COLUMBUS, Ohio — Former Ohio State football star Maurice Clarett agreed Monday to plead guilty to aggravated robbery and carrying a concealed weapon. The deal would send him to prison for at least 3 1/2 years and end two criminal cases against him.

The agreement was announced by Judge David Fais on the day jury selection was to begin in a case in which Clarett is accused of holding up two people outside of a bar.

The concealed weapon charge was from his August arrest after a highway chase with police, who found four loaded guns in Clarett's sport utility vehicle after they spiked the tires. Police used pepper spray to subdue Clarett, who was wearing a bulletproof vest.

The deal called for a 7½-year sentence with release possible after 3½ years. The 22-year-old player also agreed to serve five years of probation after the prison sentence.

Over-exercise detrimental to health

By Jennifer Funk
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In a society consumed with its own consumption of fast food and lazy entertainment, it's easy to overlook the silent minority. But, once in a while, despite that silence - or perhaps because of it – the plight of the skeletal girl frantically trying to keep in time with the stair machine or the hyper-muscular man heaving pounds of iron into the air for hours suddenly becomes loud and clear.

It's called over-exercise anorexia, or the creation of a negative calorie balance by exercising, said Sara Rosenkranz, instructor in kinesiology and director of the L.I.F.E. Program, the department's in-house fitness facility.

Though the incredibly thin female or over-muscularized male might seem the obvious images of this disorder, Rosenkranz warns that what you see is not always what you get.

"Over-exercise for one person will not be the same as over-exercise for another person," she said.

The American College of Sports Medicine recommends people accumulate 30 minutes of daily physical activity, but Rosenkranz said it's much harder to determine what constitutes a healthy maximum amount of daily physical activity.

The best guidelines are based on who the exerciser is and why he or she is exercising. Triathletes, like Rosenkranz, for instance, can easily spend an hour or more in the gym training for specific events, while people new to exercise would want to spend less time, at least in the beginning, she said.

Further, people might have over-exercise anorexia but not show the extreme weight loss that makes most over-exercise anorectics easy to identify. This is part of what makes the line between exercise and over-exercise blurry, Rosenkranz said.

So how do you identify an over-exerciser versus an athlete-in-training? Rosenkranz said when people exercise for the wrong reasons – like purely aesthetic motives – and are hurting their bodies, there is a problem.

"People will come up with very good reasons for why they are doing what they are doing, from training for a 10K to 'I'm trying to be healthy and fit.' It's when people lose sight of exercising for the right reasons and are doing it even though they're harming themselves, that's where the line (between exercise and over-exercise) is drawn," she said.

And that line can have enormous consequences.

According to HealthyPlace.com, an online mental health hub, fatigue, performance problems, decreased concentration, loss of emotional vigor, increased compulsivity, adrenal exhaustion and muscle wasting are among the symptoms of over-exercising.

The Web site suggests that the only cure for symptoms of over-exercise is complete rest. However, as with similar disorders, like anorexia nervosa, there often are underlying psychological components.

Dr. Dorinda Lambert, licensed psychologist and associate director for clinical services at University Counseling Services, said it is hard to tell someone what to do without knowing the whole situation.

"If somebody's been in any kind of compulsive behavior for an extended period of time – more than a couple of weeks – it has an impact on the mind and the body," Lambert said. "The body and the mind chemistry change."

Sometimes someone has slipped so far into a behavior that simply changing one thing to try to create balance – like getting enough sleep, proper nutrition or spending time with friends – will not be enough, she said. It's at this point that professional help can provide much-needed perspective.

"I think about (going for counseling) like trying to get traction on ice," Lambert said. "Sometimes you have to throw a little bit of sand under there to get the traction. And if you don't, you just keep spinning the wheels.

"Patterns of behavior take some time to change, and it does take some effort to do that. I do believe that people who have compulsive exercising can change that with treatment.""

Dr. Dorinda Lambert

"We all get stuck at times, even the brightest and most capable people. Getting some outside perspective is helpful, like the sand under the wheels."

Outside help, however, is something that people often are either unwilling to admit they need or afraid to seek out.
This puts family and friends of over-exercisers in precarious situations. They might feel torn between keeping their friend happy and improving their friend's physical and psychological well-being.

One of the reasons over-exercisers might resist admitting a problem is because they have decided their identity is in who they are as an exerciser, Rosenkranz said.

"I see a lot of (people defining themselves by the exercise they do) in the undergraduate population here at K-State – girls who get down on themselves if they're not doing their exercise," she said. "They find that part of how they define themselves is as someone who works out all the time."

With this in mind, friends should remember that it's OK to voice concern, but there is only so much a non-professional can do, Lambert said. She said this is especially hard for people in the Midwest to realize.

"We're in the Midwest, and people are really trained in this part of the country to be nice, and they're really focused so much on being nice that (they forget) you can't control how somebody else is going to react," she said. "You can't stop people from being angry about things."

There is never a best way to approach someone, but being direct and specific about concerns is always important, Lambert said.

After the issue has been addressed, "stepping back and not feeling responsible to make them (seek counseling)," is a big step, Lambert said.

K-State, while it has no official policy on the matter, has a loosely constructed net to catch those who fail to find help elsewhere.

Amber Long, coordinator of fitness and fitness programs at Peters Recreation Complex, said the Rec Complex doesn't ban people from exercising, but employees will suggest that people identified as having a problem visit Counseling Services and the Lafene Health Center.

"It's a three-pronged effort," Long said about the facility's practice of working with other on-campus centers.

"No matter what, I want students to be healthy," she said. "That's what I'm here for: to improve the quality of life of the students who go to K-State, whether that be improving their physical fitness, or losing weight, or helping people find balance in their life – which is usually the hardest part for people who might be over-exercising."

Lambert agreed that balance is missing in the lives of over-exercisers.

"We need to find some balance in our lives, and most of the things (like over-exercising) are a clear sign of imbalance," she said. "One of the things that people need to do is find ways to enrich their lives so that they have more activities in the areas that they have been ignoring."

Balance can be restored, though, with resolve and treatment, Lambert said.

"Patterns of behavior take some time to change, and it does take some effort to do that," Lambert said. "I do believe that people who have compulsive exercising can change that with treatment."

Videos facilitate at-home workouts

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Workout videos have changed a lot since Richard Simmons and his posse stepped around to 1980s hits in those one-piece workout suits. Shudder.

We've seen the invention of fast-paced, cardio workouts you can do at home, everything from Tae Bo to the Step Master. The times are changing.

It can be difficult to hit the gym after a long day of classes, and a good workout video that caters to one's needs might be a dream come true — right in the living room.

You Can Do!
B-

"You Can Do!," an abdominal workout that uses a stability ball. This is a fancy term for a high-tech, inflatable bouncy ball that holds one's body weight while the exerciser performs various moves.

The video shows moves and techniques, a core workout and an upper-body workout. A high-energy brunette, Leslie Sansone, leads the workout and vaguely resembles a fifth-grade teacher or Kathie Lee Gifford.

The beginning of the video is kind of slow while Sansone explains how to do the moves and work out with the ball.

The exercise adds a little challenge with light weights, but this video is programmed for people who are not comfortable with an intensive cardio workout. The exercises continue at a good pace, and let's face it - you get to play around on a bouncy ball.

beginners and the more advanced. Several of the moves work the upper and lower body simultaneously. Like a Tae Bo flashback, some punching action ensues halfway through the video, but the main crux of this video is to raise the heart rate and work the entire body.

Fast-paced techno music keeps things entertaining and makes this a practical video to have in your collection.

The Firm
B-

"The Firm," offers body sculpting with a complete aerobics workout and weight training.

First impression: all five women are wearing color-coordinated teal green workout clothes. If you're going to exercise, it might as well be in style.

The workout requires a few more objects, including various weights and an aerobic step. This program gets the heart pumping and works a lot of different muscles.

The video provides workouts for

Aerobic Striptease
C-

Last and probably least, the most awkward display of home exercise I have ever experienced — "Carmen Electra's Aerobic Striptease."

Yes, this is a five-disc series of Electra teaching a variety of provocative moves for people who want to "strip their way to fitness." I didn't think they could legally sell this kind of thing in department stores.

The video begins with Electra explaining the importance of warming up and breathing. On the DVD menu, you can choose to listen to hip-hop, techno or rock music. It's not a bad start, but then we get into the workout - or lack thereof.

The workout includes swinging hips back and forth, walking around seductively and, the big highlight, smacking your tush every once in a while for effect.

Electra tries to explain the moves at the beginning of the routine, and participants then get to express themselves during the second part, which is simply music and the routine.

This video gives a good abdominal workout, but only from the excessive laughter released by watching Electra's catlike prowl. If you want a good laugh, this is the video for you. But make sure you watch out for Electra's long, flowing locks of hair — she almost gets whiplash during warm-ups.

HPV vaccine now available to slow spread of disease

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A vaccine for the fastest growing disease on college campuses, Human Papilloma Virus, is now available at Lafene Health Center, said Mary Todd, assistant director of the Women's Center.

An estimated 20 million people are infected with HPV, which is the leading cause of cervical cancer and responsible for many cases of genital warts, according to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention's Web site.

About 12,000 women develop HPV each year, and 4,000 women per year die from the disease, according to the American Cancer Society Web site.

This disease does not only affect women, but also affects men, said Dr. Wendy Blank, director of the Women's Clinic at Lafene.

"One-half to three-fourths of people who have sex will come in contact with HPV in their lifetime," Blank said.

Students who are targets for the disease are those who have sex, protected or unprotected, and those who have multiple partners, Blank said.

HPV usually is contracted through vaginal and anal intercourse. It is possible, but not likely, to contract HPV through oral contact. Most HPV infections don't trigger symptoms and go away on their own, according to the CDC.

According to the HPV Web site at www.hpv.com, there are 30 identified types of HPV.

However, the vaccination only covers high-risk types 16 and 18, which cause 70 percent of cases of cervical cancer, and low-risk types 6 and 11, which cause 90 percent of cases of genital warts, Blank said.

Todd said most people do not realize that condoms do not protect people from HPV, because it can be contracted without intercourse.

"Direct genital skin to genital skin spreads the virus; the virus is not spread through blood or bodily fluids," Blank said.

Hailed by many doctors as a breakthrough in cancer prevention, Gardasil, the HPV vaccination manufactured by Merck & Co., Inc., is stocked by Lafene and prevents infections from four strains of HPV.

The cost is $135 per dose, and the vaccination consists of three doses. The second and third doses must be taken two and six months, respectively, after the first.

Carol Kennedy, director of health promotion at Lafene, said all doses must be taken for the vaccine to be effective.

Merck announced June 29 that the CDC's Advisory Committee on Immunization Practices (ACIP) voted unanimously to recommend that girls and women 11- to 26-years-old be vaccinated with Gardasil.

Limiting sexual partners also will lower one's risk of contracting the disease.

"The more partners they have had, the more exposure to different types of HPV they can pass on to you," Blank said.

There is a 64-percent chance of contracting HPV with each act of unprotected sex with an infected partner, according to the CDC Web site.

Although HPV is not a life-threatening disease, it can turn into cervical cancer if it goes untreated, Blank said. Thus, regular Pap smears should be taken to make sure there are no abnormalities on the cervix. If there are abnormalities, several steps must be taken to ensure proper treatment.

"We don't find out what type of HPV someone has," Blank said. "After an abnormal Pap, you must get a colposcopy, which is going in and taking biopsy specimens of the cervix to be tested. After that, a high-risk HPV test can be taken. But there is no true test to find out if you have HPV or not. All we can do is just give you treatment for your specific situation."

The vaccine is expensive, Blank said, but it is worth it. Students should check with their insurance carriers about coverage.

To be eligible for the vaccine students must be younger than 27 years old. If they are older, they will need to consult a healthcare provider before the vaccine can be administered. Those who are pregnant should not get the vaccine.

The vaccine is not a cure for those who already have HPV, but it can prevent students from contracting a new strand, Blank said.

"Most cases of cervical cancer are not diagnosed until age 40, which is a good reason for college women to take care of themselves now," Blank said.

Blank said the vaccination is an important step in women's health, and she recommends the vaccine for students who fit the criteria.

"I envision, in four years, all freshmen would already have the vaccine," Blank said.

Experts label obesity a disease

By Megan Molitor
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

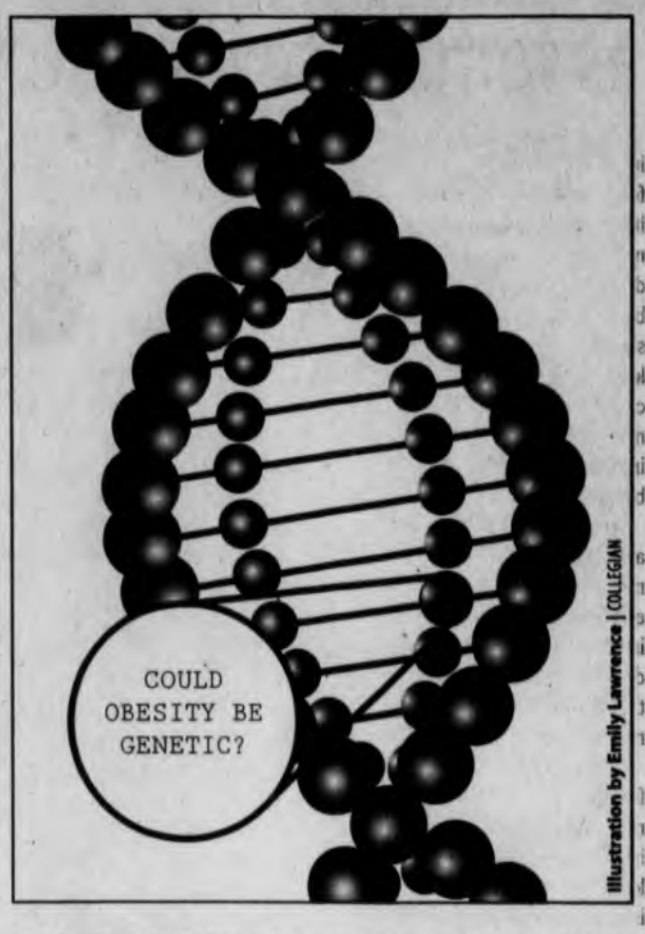

Illustration by Emily Lawrence | COLLEGIAN

Numerous medical organizations have said obese people might not be at fault for their obesity.

The International Classification of Diseases, published by the World Health Organization, lists obesity as a disease. Other organizations, like the Institute of Medicine, agree with the findings.

"Obesity is a heterogeneous disease in which genetic, environmental, psychological and other factors are involved. It occurs when energy intake exceeds the amount of energy expanded over time," according to the IOM.

The Internal Revenue Service took this information into account when, in 2000, it began a policy that allowed for tax breaks for individuals with obesity. In 2002, it updated this policy.

The policy now says "uncompensated amounts paid by individuals for participation in a weight-loss program as treatment for a specific disease or diseases diagnosed by a physician are expenses for medical care."

However, not everyone can claim these breaks in taxes. The weight-loss program must be prescribed by a doctor.

The question still stands as to what makes a person obese.

Dianna Schalles, nutritionist at Lafene Health Center, said the BMI (body mass index) is a formula that can be used as an indicator of optimal weight for health.

"It is an appropriate measure of body fat based on an individual's height and weight," Schalles said.

A BMI of 19-24 is normal, and 25-29.9 is overweight, she said. A BMI of 30 or above marks obesity.

Schalles said the results of this test are not always accurate, as it doesn't measure the percentage of body fat or where fat is stored.

Schalles said she agrees with the medical community's findings that obesity is a disease, based on research.

"It is a multi-factorial disease caused by a combination of physiological, genetic, behavioral, social and environmental influences," she said.

However, she said she recognizes the limitations this statement.

"Although some individuals have a higher predisposition to obesity, I personally believe that the focus should be on the lifestyle factors within a person's control," Schalles said. "This includes activity level, food choices and stress management."

However, some individuals still question the validity of the findings.

"I don't believe that it could be a real disease, because people can choose what they eat and make their own life choices," said Katie Imel, senior in education. "If obesity runs in a family, then I think it can be tougher to lose weight, but some people might just assume that it is natural and not make the effort to keep it off."

'Hooking Up' serves as female sex guide

Hooking Up: A Girl's All-out Guide to Sex & Sexuality
A-
Reviewed by Emily Lawrence

"Hooking Up" is a strong resource for information on sex and human sexual development for young women of all ages.

Author Amber Madison, 22, is a recent graduate of Tufts University in Medford, Mass., where she was the writer of a popular sex column for the Tufts daily newspaper. Her personal experience and degrees in American studies and community health give her the realistic and personable credibility that help this book address touchy private issues with a light, teen-magazine tone.

The book covers more than female anatomy. It crosses the sexual gamut with everything from pubic hair styles to intercourse.

Madison covers topics like STDs and pregnancy technically and personally. One anecdote, a story of how, right before her period each month, she freaks out that she might be pregnant no matter how much protection she used, is something to which most sexually active women can relate. However, the topic is not laughed off.

The chapter offers options for women who find themselves in the "big (uh) O" situation. Madison even includes a flow chart explaining which sexual acts can result in pregnancy.

The book's most useful tool is the index, which makes Madison's work a resource, not just a good read. Categories are listed in slang. For example, if readers wanted to look up "balls," they would find "Balls. See testicles."

Whether you're a virgin or a sexpert or have a girlfriend or sister who fits either, this a good book to have on hand for any sex and relationship questions that arise.

Knowledge of STDs decreases risk

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When it comes to sexually transmitted diseases, what you don't know can hurt you.

Students might be aware of the different types of diseases, like Chlamydia, Gonorrhea and Syphilis, but many do not get tested.

One reason for not getting tested is that students don't realize they have an STD, said Katie Puhlman, senior in biology and member of Sexual Health Awareness Peer Educators.

"A common symptom of STDs is that they don't have symptoms," Puhlman said.

She said a common question students ask is how to know if they have an STD. When students do not realize they have an STD, they might continue to pass it on unknowingly.

Annisa Shockey, junior in biology and member of S.H.A.P.E., said another thing students don't know is that there is not just one STD test, but different screenings for the different types of STDs.

"If you're sexually active, you should get tested at least once a year," Shockey said.

S.H.A.P.E. gives out information about sexual health through presentations and different activities, Shockey said.

According to the Lafene Web site, the three most common STDs at K-State are Herpes, genital warts and Chlamydia.

Carol Kennedy, director of health promotions for Lafene, said students wanting to be tested for an STD can make an appointment with a physician and explain their health concerns.

"Usually the physician will talk to the student about what factors put them at risk," Kennedy said.

Urine, blood and swab tests are all used to determine the presence of a disease, she said. Swabs of lesions also can be tested. Each of the different tests have different prices, but visits with the physicians are free for students paying campus privilege fees.

She said students can receive follow-up care at Lafene after being tested.

According to the Lafene Web site, it offers screenings for Gonorrhea, Chlamydia, Syphilis, HIV, Hepatitis B, Hepatitis C and Trichomoniasis.

Kennedy stressed that abstinence is the safest way to prevent STDs, and students who do not practice safe sex regularly should be tested.

"If students consistently use condoms, they are at a much lower risk," Kennedy said.

Jennifer Ruth, spokesperson for the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, said United States youth continue to be affected significantly by STDs.

A study in 2000 by Weinstock, Berman and Cotes found that about 18.9 million new cases of STDs were reported, and nearly half of these occurred in 15- to 24-year-olds, who represented 25 percent of the sexually active population, Ruth said.

She said these figures are consistent with previous estimates that STDs and their costs are more concentrated in younger people, who typically have multiple sexual partners and are more likely to engage in unprotected intercourse.

"It is important to remember that the data on reported cases of STDs, which are useful for examining overall trends and trends among populations at risk, represent only a small proportion of the true national burden of STDs," Ruth said. "Many cases of STDs go undiagnosed."

Symptoms: Most common in women and include abnormal discharge and discomfort during intercourse and urination; most men do not have symptoms, but symptoms include irritation and burning sensation when urinating
Risks: Can increase a woman's susceptibility to HIV
Curable: Yes, can usually be cured with prescription drugs

Genital Herpes: A common disease in the nation that affects one in every five adolescents and adults; occurs more frequently in women than men
Symptoms: Outbreak of sores, and can include flu-like symptoms, such as fever and swollen glands
Risks: Can create painful genital sores and frequently causes psychological distress; for pregnant women, it potentially can cause fatal infections in babies
Curable: No, but antiviral medications can shorten and prevent outbreaks

Seeking employment

Résumés in hand, students prepare to pitch themselves to employers

By Ericka Brunson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Some might see K-State's Career Fair as a way to look at jobs, but Kacy Coulter, senior in agricultural economics and marketing, views it as an opportunity to join the career force.

Coulter began preparing for the fair weeks ago, working on her résumé and attending résumé-building workshops.

"I heard about the fair through the department heads and adviser e-mails," Coulter said. "They were really good about getting the word out."

Hoping to one day own her own chain of John Deere dealerships, Coulter said she felt it was important to disseminate her interests and ideas.

"I am here to hopefully find a job," she said. "There are a lot of different offers here and various types of organizations that may lead to a career."

Coulter fills out an application for Swift & Company while Kris Jensen, an employer for the company, fills out information for applicants Tuesday afternoon at Bramlage Coliseum.

But showing up is only half the battle, she said. Preparing for the Career Fair is hard work, and the most difficult part is getting started.

"Once you have everything going, it's easy, but once you start putting it down on paper and not just brainstorming, it's really hard," Coulter said.

Jennifer Brantley, assistant director of Career and Employment Services, helped recruit a group of employers that would offer good opportunities for K-State students.

"It was very difficult to make sure we got a well-rounded group of employers," Brantley said. "This year we have over 290 employers all looking for K-State talent."

"I worked with Mary Ellen Barkley (CES assistant director) on building and expanding my résumé," she said. "She does a lot for the College of Agriculture."

Both Coulter and Brantley said a clean résumé and extensive research into companies of interest are important.

Coulter researched online the businesses that interested her and then set up interviews prior to the fair. This is one way to show you are interested in the company, said

Regional groups consider building horse center

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan might offer a new facility to house horses and equestrian events in the near future, but regional officials need some questions answered first.

To determine the possibility of constructing the facility, called the EquiCenter by supporters, regional organizations have commissioned a $70,000 feasibility report. The report will be done by a private contractor during the next few months, and a final report will be given in January 2007.

Involved groups include the Manhattan City Commission, the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce, the KSU Foundation, Riley and Pottawatomie counties, Junction City and the EquiCenter's potential neighbor, Meadowlark Hills.

County Commissioner Mike Kearns said the feasibility study will determine whether the EquiCenter is possible and if it would be a beneficial addition to the community and surrounding area.

"The preliminary info that we've been provided indicates that it will create job opportunities, and it will create opportunities for the farmers to sell items to the EquiCenter," Kearns said. "It will also bring in sales tax dollars to the region."

Contributors
Riley County $10,000
Manhattan City Commission $20,000
Manhattan Chamber of Commerce $10,000
KSU Foundation $10,000
Pottowatomie County $10,000
Junction City $7,500
Meadowlark Hills $2,500
Total $70,000

"It'll bring dollars outside of the area into the area," he said, "but it's not a done deal."

The money for the structure is still a question in the minds of interested parties, but Kearns said he does not support using tax dollars to pay for the structure.

The events center, which has been estimated at about $20 million, would have an indoor, multi-purpose arena for competitions, horse stalls, a maintenance facility and parking for trailers and RVs.

Along with the covered multi-purpose arena, Aaron Hund, KSU Foundation director of development

Associate professor Xue dies

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Frank Xue, associate professor of finance, died last Thursday at Stormont-Vail Hospital in Topeka.

Anand Desai, head of the Department of Finance, said Xue died at about 3 a.m. Thursday. He had been in a coma on life support for more than two weeks after entering the hospital on Aug. 30. Desai said Xue showed no obvious health problems before being admitted to the hospital. Xue was 35 years old.

Desai said the cause of Xue's death has not been released because of privacy laws at the university. He was entering his third year at K-State as an associate professor.

Xue is remembered by his associates as a kind and intelligent man.

"Everybody in the faculty really liked to be around him," Desai said. "He was liked by his students, had a good sense of humor and was a very witty person."

Desai said Xue was respected by his colleagues, especially for his research abilities. His greatest accomplishment might have been the publication of one of his research essays in the "Journal of Finance," one of the most prestigious finance magazines in the nation. Desai said few finance professors are accepted in the journal.

"He was very intense and very honest in whatever he did," Eric Higgins, associate professor of finance, said. "It is always nice to work with a person who really cares

Junction City man arrested on 6 charges

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Richard Brian Jackson, Junction City, was arrested Monday on one charge of theft, two charges of obstruction of the legal process and three charges of failure to appear, said Lt. Michael Quintanar of the Riley County Police Department.

The theft charges stem from an alleged attempted theft of a heavy duty belt sander and a Craftsman toolbox from Sears Roebuck and Co., 103 Manhattan Town Center.

Additional charges of failure to appear resulted from a Sept. 6 incident from the Riley County District Court on charges of aggravated battery, driving while suspended, possession of cocaine and battery of a law enforcement officer, Quintanar said.

One of the charges of theft and two of the charges of failure to appear are misdemeanors, while one charge of obstruction of the legal process and one charge of failure to appear are felonies.

Total bond was set at $38,500.

Cuban drum group uses blend of rhythms to broaden views

Josh Rouse
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A mishmash blend of Spanish-themed music rang out in the K-State Student Union Tuesday night as Cuban drum group "Manos" performed for a packed audience.

The Kansas City area-based band, a part of the Traditional Music Society, blended rhythms of Spanish, African and Native American origin to create a cultural medley.

Bird Fleming, one of the percussionists, said one of the main reasons he performed this show was to teach others about different cultures.

"I've been playing for 32 years, and I just had the desire for music," Fleming said. "I played clarinet in high school, but I love to play drums. I started teaching a lot and found that you just need to pass it on."

Gary Helm, who plays bass and some percussion, said one of the benefits of the show is its effect on the audience.

"It just shows them how beautiful Cuban music is," Helm said. "It might be something they've never heard of. Maybe it'll just broaden people's perspective on things."

One audience member said his favorite part was the finale, when the band marched in front of the audience and played.

"My favorite part was the ending, because they just kept on going and going," Kris Wheeler, senior in secondary education, said. "I was ready to leave, but they just kept on going, and I was like 'Oh, I really want to stay. This is exciting.'"

Wheeler said he enjoyed hearing different styles of music from diverse origins.

"It's good to see the other cultures. You get to see a different view of a culture, and I think their music is absolutely amazing. It feels free and relaxed, and it's totally opposite of America. I loved it."

Valuable assets

Government budget should favor children over military

ZACHARY T. ECKELS

What is the most valuable thing we have in the United States?

Could it be our latest stealth aircraft? Or how about our missile technology, which keeps us safe by destroying others?

And don't forget about all of the different varieties of guns we've stocked up.

Well, if calling these things our most valuable assets sounds stupid to you, I'm glad. But you wouldn't know that by looking at our country's budget. For far too long, we've spent at least seven times more on our military than on any other expense.

Let's face it, the war on terrorism and the war in Iraq aren't going to be won. There can't be a treaty to stop the violence when another group will end up taking the place of the first.

These wars are a vain attempt to solve the world's biggest problems during our lifetime when resolutions likely will take much longer.

So what is the most valuable thing we have in the United States? Our children, and we don't even come close to spending enough on them.

According to www.usccb.org, one in six children in the United States lives in poverty.

That's the potential of nearly 12 million children gone to waste.

So how can we fix this problem? Well, like it or not, the French figured this one out before us. The child-care options offered in France simply blow ours out of the water.

Then again, forcing a single mother to work a low-paying job while her kids are home alone or at an expensive day care isn't too hard to beat.

From the first month of pregnancy until childbirth, the French help the mother financially. After the child is born, she is given an allowance for her child. This money provides for the basic needs like food and clothing for the child.

But the French don't stop there. They even provide public preschools and day cares.

Wouldn't it be great to have a reliable place to leave your child(ren), while you get all those errands out of the way?

I'm not saying our country doesn't care about its children. Issues like sex, violence and video games continually listed as causes of the problems of today's children.

But these fears rarely lead to increases in education budgets to help prepare future generations for their eventual time on top.

That's what is important for us to consider.

It might not ever benefit us, but sometimes the larger picture has to be more important than ourselves.

Both parties fail public by using issues for votes, not progress

SCOTT GIRARD

However, since its discovery in the late 1990s, stem-cell research has not come close to finding the cure for most diseases.

One would think our country would concentrate on finding cures for diseases like Alzheimer's and Lou Gehrig's, but, sadly enough, that is not the central issue in stem-cell research.

As of right now, the United States is spending more time focused on the question of when a fetus becomes a human life than on the question of how can we improve research technology.

Both sides of the political community can be blamed for this obvious disregard for the health of individuals.

Many Republicans on Capitol Hill use this issue as a moral standing ground in hopes of garnering votes from the public. It might have worked in the last few elections, but these politicians might be saddened by the results of a May 2005 CBS poll that reported 50 percent of Republicans support stem-cell research.

They should be fine, though. Instead of labeling liberals as baby killers, these Republicans could say they drink the blood of monkeys for sustenance.

I make fun of conservatives, but the Democratic party is just as guilty of neglect. Much like their counterparts, Democrats have used the issue to gain votes from the liberal population.

The main argument against stem-cell research is that it unnecessarily takes the life of an innocent being. I will not argue when a fetus becomes an actual living human being. That would be akin to arguing who was the best Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtle.

Many people fail to examine thoroughly the process of obtaining stem cells. According to the National Congress of State Legislatures Web site, stem cells can be acquired from aborted fetuses, unused in-vitro fertilization embryos or cloned cells.

Some people do not know, or care to know, that the cells from these processes would be discarded if not used for research. If people label supporters of stem-cell research as murderers, they also will have to expand their label to any doctor who has ever thrown away an unused embryo.

Another argument against stem-cell research is that it has not produced the results many doctors and liberals said it would.

There are several reasons for this. First, the technology of stem-cell research is growing at a tremendous pace even now. Current federal policy allows federally funded clinics to use only stem-cell lines created before August 2001. This has caused problems for many doctors, because these lines are aging and can no longer produce valuable research material. It would be like using a new titanium driver with an old feather golf ball.

It would be hard to deny the curing potential of stem cells. Clinics have circumvented the restrictions, raised money from the private sector for research, and made serious progress in the field.

It is time for politicians to examine the benefits of issues, rather than simply taking the stance that will garner the most votes.

Stem cells have the potential to cure life-threatening diseases with little chance of ending innocent lives, but not until the government realizes it.

Though expensive, EquiCenter feasibility study makes sense for future of region

Though activities a mega-facility would provide might be entertaining or educational, it seems unlikely they also would be profitable.

Considering the city already has ample space for such things in Weber Arena, the fairgrounds and classrooms on campus, the construction of a completely new space for similar purposes seems unnecessary.

Right now, regional groups are spending $70,000 just to find out if a huge new EquiCenter could make money and if it would be used.

That seems like a large amount of money. However, it is minute compared to the actual expense of building such a structure. The cost of the proposed center is estimated at $10 million.

If the region and university have plans to move forward with plans for the EquiCenter, we should be thankful they first are investing the time and money to determine whether it would be a benefit to the community.

Perhaps we also should be grateful they are trying to keep additional taxes off the list of funding sources.

At this point in the process, we still have the opportunity to voice input and criticism before a bigger chunk of money goes to the project. At least they aren't putting the cart before the horse, so to speak.

Students line up for Cold Stone's college night ice cream bargain

By Kristina Monroe
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students wait in a line half-a-block long Tuesday nights to get a taste of Cold Stone Creamery ice cream.

College night at Cold Stone is 7-10 p.m. every Tuesday. Any student who presents a K-State ID will receive a "buy one, get one for 25 cents" special.

"I don't eat dessert all week so I can come here on Tuesdays," Rachelle Burch, freshman in marketing, said.

Burch and Jordan Wolfe, sophomore in kinesiology, were 43rd in what quickly became a line of about 60 people. Burch and Wolfe said they knew they were in for a long wait but didn't mind.

"It's that good," Wolfe said.

Laura Boroughs, senior in elementary education and agronomy, said she comes to Cold Stone every few weeks with friends Lindsey Boet, Bryan Ross and Holly Weber, all students in agronomy.

"Cold Stone is always worth the price, but when you're a college student, it's hard to pay for it," Boroughs said.

"I wouldn't come if it wasn't college night," Weber said.

Each of the four chose different flavors. Boroughs had mint ice cream with M&M's; Boet chose a Cold Stone special called Knights in White Chocolate. Ross ordered Chocolate Devotion, and Weber ate French vanilla ice cream with Kit Kats.

"I actually ordered French vanilla with Crunch, but this is good," Weber said.

Cassie Freyermuth has worked at Cold Stone since April and is now a crew leader.

"The weirdest combination I have ever mixed was cotton candy ice cream with walnuts, gummy bears and graham cracker pie crust mixed in," said Freyermuth, senior in vocal performance and music education. "It might have been OK without the walnuts."

Freyermuth said her favorite flavor is mint.

The Aggieville Cold Stone has 16 flavors of ice cream and nearly 40 different candies, fruits, cookies and other toppings available.

"This line won't be gone at closing," Freyermuth said. "Right at 10 p.m. we hand out tickets to all those standing in line, and they get served."

And Cold Stone employees don't expect customers to wait in line without some type of entertainment. Customers who leave a tip are rewarded with a song by the whole crew.

'Hitch' inspiration gives students dating advice

By Jesse Sachdeva
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Relationship expert David Coleman gave a dating advice workshop to a crowd of nearly 300 students in the Union Ballroom Tuesday night.

Coleman, a best-selling author and advice columnist, is most famous for his role as the inspiration for the romantic comedy film "Hitch."

Coleman said some of the traits of Will Smith's character in the movie are based on his own experiences.

"The opening scene where the guy saves the puppy is similar to something I've had my clients do," Coleman said. "The scene with the seafood allergy was also true," Coleman said jokingly, "only mine was a lot worse."

Coleman opened the show on a light note, a contest between audience members to see who could come up with the most creative pick-up line, before delving into the more serious subject matter of his presentation.

During his two-hour presentation, Coleman touched on many subjects relevant to college students, including long-distance relationships, knowing when to break up, and meeting and dating new people.

A highlight of Coleman's presentation was a word game in which audience members picked their favorite body of water and gave three adjectives to describe it. Coleman then revealed, for hilarious results, that their answers described their attitudes toward and expectations of sex.

After the show, Hayley Darpel, freshman in art education, said, "I liked (the show). It had some things I'd heard before but also some new things I'd like to try out, too."

Union Program Council Forums chairs Tristan Tafolla and Kyle Malone said they were pleased with the turnout and response to Coleman's performance.

"He (Coleman) presented a good message in an entertaining way," Tafolla said, "and we were glad to have him back again this year."

Walk or ride; don't drive

Who has time to walk or ride a bicycle to class?

What about taking the stairs? Why exert all that energy when all you have to do is press one little button?

Work smarter, not harder, right?

Wrong. You're fooling yourself. When it comes to your health, working a little harder might just be the smartest thing you can do.

We're all busy, and the last thing on a lot of our minds is going to the gym to exercise. That's OK. But you can make some simple changes to your daily routine that will help ensure you are healthy and fit well into the future.

START WALKING

According to the American Council on Exercise, per mile, walking has a net caloric cost equal to 50 to 60 percent of that of running. That means if you burn 100 calories running one mile, you'll burn up to 60 calories walking the same distance.

Also, while walking at a relatively leisurely pace of three miles per hour, a person weighing 150 pounds will burn 3.7 calories for every minute he or she walks. If that person walks for 20 minutes, he or she will burn 74 calories. That same person could burn 112 calories walking at four miles per hour for the same amount of time.

So start walking. Incorporate it into your daily life. I've seen people who live a block off campus ride their motorcycles to class, and it's ridiculous. Leave home five minutes earlier and do yourself a favor.

If walking is too simplistic for you, ride a bicycle.

According to the ACE, riding a bicycle at a relaxed pace is equal in energy expenditure to running at six miles per hour.

Plus, the gas is cheap, the parking is fantastic and, unless you live out of town, the ride is sure to take no more than 20 minutes.

TAKE THE STAIRS

It upsets me when an able-bodied person takes the elevator on the second floor of Hale Library to the first floor just to avoid taking the stairs.

Come on. You have gravity working with you. The laws of physics are in your favor. It's called potential energy. All you have to do is hold onto the railing and put one foot in front of the other.

According to the ACE, stair climbing requires the same amount of energy as running at six miles per hour. That's

Make small changes in diet, stress management to improve health

By Melissa Haug
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

We all do it, whether you admit it to yourself or not. That's right – we all do things that aren't good for our health.

Some people overeat, some smoke, and some drink too much alcohol too often. Others fail to take their blood pressure medicine, and some find better things to do besides study or exercise.

Such behaviors reflect personal choices, habits or possibly customs that are influenced by our social atmosphere. The good news: all of the above choices are modifiable lifestyle behaviors. With motivation and dedication, you can easily put yourself on the fast track to better overall health for now and later.

The first step is to determine and strengthen a safe social network.

It's best to be around and confide in individuals who understand your goals. Understanding your dedication could motivate them to live a healthier life as well.

Once you have achieved this task, you are ready to gradually change your lifestyle behaviors to better serve your health.

The main focuses for overall physical and mental health are developing healthy eating habits, staying physically active, getting adequate sleep, and using a combination of relaxing leisure hobbies and social networking with family and friends to manage stress.

HEALTHY EATING

Katharine K. Grunewald, registered dietician and professor of nutrition at K-State, said rather than monitor food intake, people should change food behaviors and create a daily routine that works for them.

"The government's My Pyramid Plan gives the recommended number of food servings for each population group – quantitative – and suggestions for foods from each group – qualitative," Grunewald said. "That is a good place to start. Beyond that is the challenge of working it into your schedule."

A good place to begin healthy eating habits is by starting your day with a hearty breakfast.

"Substitute refined breads/cereals with whole grain and try to get the lean or lower-fat meat and dairy products," Grunewald said. "Most people also need to eat more fruits and vegetables."

EXERCISE

Find a way to schedule exercise five or six days a week. Strive to maintain variety during the 30 to 60 minutes of American Council on Sports Medicine recommended cardio training on all or most days of the week. Gradually work to add at least 20 minutes of a weight program two to three of those days to gain muscle mass.

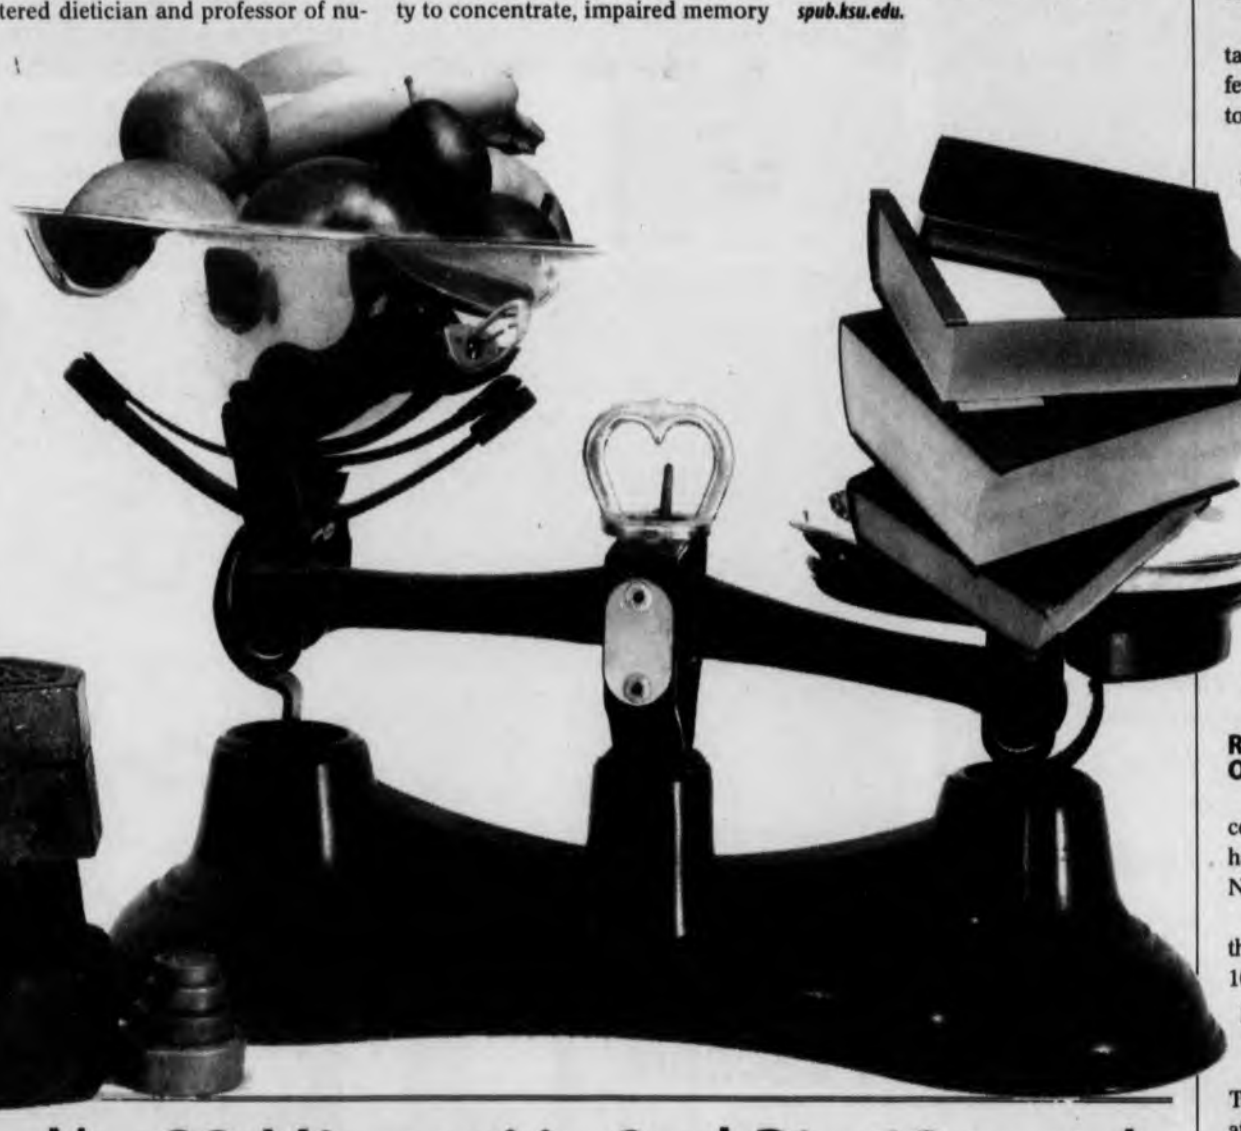
SLEEP

Although sleep is necessary for repair and efficient function of the nervous system, most Americans still do not get enough sleep. The average American gets less than six hours of sleep a night when most adults need seven to eight hours to reap benefits. Too little sleep results in short tempers, irritability, inability to concentrate, impaired memory and poor physical performance.

STRESS MANAGEMENT

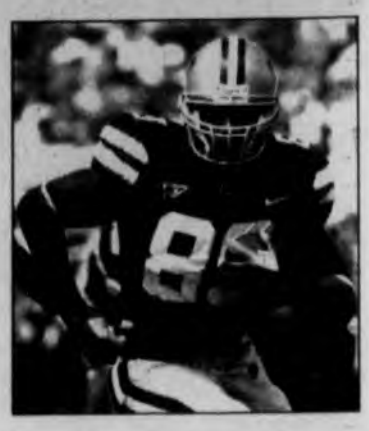
For starters, it is difficult to completely eliminate stress from your life. It seems that only when stress becomes so overpowering that it results in health concerns, we finally decide to take action.

The best way to prevent high stress levels is to change your perception of each particular stressor. Actual events do not cause stress; instead, stress is caused by your response to them.



Exercise can be used as a stress reliever. Time management (a planner), speaking with a friend or simply doing something you enjoy are all ways to lower stress levels.

Amber Long, coordinator of fitness programs for Recreational Services, said the key to overall health is to think longevity in a desired goal.



"My suggestion would be to tackle one goal at a time so individuals making lifestyle changes are not overwhelmed," Long said.

"As gradual changes are made, they will all fit hand-in-hand to create an overall healthy mind, body and attitude. Getting adequate amounts of sleep makes you feel energized to exercise, which often equates to monitoring food intake and all of these play into reducing stress."

Melissa Haug is a senior in public health nutrition and dietetics and a nutrition consultant and American Council on Exercise certified personal trainer at Peters Recreation Complex. Please send comments to sports@spub.ksu.edu.

Norwood suspended for Louisville game

By Jonathan Garten
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When K-State faces No. 8 Louisville this weekend, it will have to do so without its top receiver, junior tight end Rashaad Norwood.

Norwood was arrested Sunday for obstructing the legal process and disorderly conduct. Coach Ron Prince said at Tuesday's press conference that Norwood was suspended for Saturday's game against the Cardinals.

"I'm disappointed in what happened, and I'm disappointed in the circumstances that would lead to such an event," Prince said.

Norwood leads all K-State players with 13 catches and 143 yards. The 13 catches match his season total from last year.

Norwood is the second Wildcat to be suspended this season. Senior running back Thomas Clayton missed the first game against Illinois State after Prince suspended Clayton for one game following his conviction on June 9. The running back was arrested on charges of aggravated assault on Sept. 16, 2005.

NO. 1 OFFENSE

The Cardinals arrive in Manhattan this week, bringing the No. 1 offense in the nation in scoring and total yards.

After three games, Louisville is averaging 50.7 points per game. The Cardinal offense also is racking up 563.7 total yards per contest.

"This is a coach who is in the national elite," Prince said. "I think he might be the best offensive mind in the game."

Petrino's attack has remained balanced this year with 307 yards per game passing and 256.7 yards per game rushing.

RANKED NON-CONFERENCE OPPONENTS

Louisville is the first ranked non-conference team to come to Manhattan since the Wildcats defeated No. 11 USC, 27-20, in 2002.

"We knew going into the season that this team was going to be a Top-10 team," Prince said. "Many of the players on this team I'm familiar with from recruiting back east."

The last time K-State played a Top-10 non-conference opponent at home was in 1975 when the Wildcats lost to No. 6 Texas A&M, 10-0.

MENTAL MISTAKES

After the Wildcats committed more penalties, 14, for more yards, 116, against Marshall than they had in the first two games combined, Prince said the players will need to cut down on the mental errors.

"Players are responsible for their own penalties," Prince said. "We've told them that from the beginning, so we're doing everything we can to bring that message home loud and clear."

So what will happen if K-State receives that many penalties against No. 8 Louisville?

"I don't think there's very many teams from here on out that we can conduct the game with that performance from that standpoint," Prince said.

Wildcats face No. 22 Missouri in 2nd Big 12 match

By Jessi Hernandez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State volleyball team will return to Ahearn Field House at 7 tonight to take on the Missouri, following a loss at Baylor last week to open conference play.

The Wildcats (8-3, 0-1) will face the No. 22-ranked team in the country, Missouri (7-4, 1-1), who split its first two conference games last week, losing to Colorado 2-3 and bouncing back to beat Texas A&M 3-1.

Missouri is led by senior outside hitter Jessica Vander Kooi, who has posted 171 kills and a team-leading 49 blocks this season, and senior middle blocker Nicole Wilson, who trails Vander Kooi with 110 kills and 46 blocks.

K-State coach Suzie Fritz said the Wildcats have had a chance to determine Missouri's biggest threats.

"They (Missouri) have three very complete outside hitters, and, in my opinion, an All-Big 12 middle (blocker) in Nicole Wilson," Fritz said.

Fritz said to contain the Missouri offense, the Wildcats will have to serve aggressively forcing the Tigers out of their system.

Junior libero Angie Lastra said the team needs to be more aggressive in serving and improve its defense.

"For this game we need to be a better defensive team (than last week), dig more balls and make more effort," she said.

Junior setter Stacey Spiegelberg, who recorded her 2,000th assist during the Baylor match, said she is excited to face a Big 12 team at home.

Commission OKs predevelopment

By Megan Moser
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The city took a step toward the development of a new entertainment district Tuesday.

City commissioners approved predevelopment and pre-engineering agreements with Dial Realty Corporation of Omaha, Neb., for the south end of the downtown redevelopment district – the area between Poyntz Avenue and Leavenworth Street on the north and south, and between Tuttle Creek Boulevard and Fourth Street on the east and west.

The south end is the second-greatest portion of the overall redevelopment project to undergo such a step. The district's north end development plan was approved in June 2006.

"This is really another major step forward," Commissioner Tom Phillips said. "This will be a wonderful completion and addition and a big step forward."

Though both measures passed 5-0, commissioners expressed concern about acquiring the necessary property in time. They plan to begin the acquisition process by July 2007.

In the north end, development has met with apprehension by some home and business owners, and the city has invoked eminent domain.

"We need to be very considerate of the rights of property owners," Commissioner Ed Klimek said.

Assistant city manager Jason Hilgers said the city will use eminent domain as a last resort.

"This may be a more difficult process than we thought because of the time table, but we're going to all the people on the south end to get their feedback," Hilgers said.

Though Director of Public Works Jeff Hancock said he expected to see some unexpected utility issues since the area is an older part of town, he said he wanted to see the pre-engineering agreement with HWS Consulting Group passed.

Development agreements in the south end have not yet been finalized, so if the city and Dial don't come to an agreement, they will split the costs of predevelopment 50-50.

Commissioners also approved the rezoning of a new set of town homes at Miller Ranch Residential Planned Unit Development, south of Miller Parkway and west of Fort Riley Boulevard. At the Sept. 5 meeting, the Miller Ranch homeowners' association had some concerns about the developer's plan for a 14-unit contiguous structure to be built in the area.

The issue was put off until Tuesday, when the developer presented a plan for four three-unit structures instead.

Phillips said he was impressed by both parties' willingness to compromise.

"How refreshing it is to see a rezoning process where both sides are equitable and leave the room happy," he said.

Group's sleep-out aids homeless

By Kristen Roderick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan Emergency Shelter Inc. spends an average of $16,000 to $20,000 a month on expenses, and Silver Key Sophomore Honorary spent a chilly night in Bosco Student Plaza to help pay this month's bills.

After the group raised $3,000 this year, $300 more than what it made last year, one student's parents donated $2,000 to the proceeds.

"We were just talking, and I told them the details about it," said Christine Fosnacht, sophomore in animal science and Silver Key member. "They thought it was a good cause, so they donated."

This increased funds raised for the shelter to more than $5,000, said Ana Miller, sophomore in business administration pre-professional and Silver Key vice president.

"I'm excited to do something worthwhile," Miller said. "It makes a difference."

At about 8 p.m., about 20 members of the group gathered with their sleeping bags, pillows and warm clothes. Miller said the night will see games, homework and time together, but probably little sleep.

"Even if we don't sleep, it impacts lives," she said.

Mandy Chapman Semple, executive director of the shelter, spent about 45 minutes sharing with attendees what the shelter is all about.

She said the shelter is too small for the growing number of homeless people around Manhattan. So far this year, shelter employees have had to turn away at least 10 people per month.

"It's alarming, because the shelter isn't equipped for this," Chapman Semple said.

The average stay for most families in the shelter is 11 nights, but they can stay for a maximum of six weeks, she said.

Tiffany Hands, sophomore in communication science and disorders, said she's glad to do her part to help those staying at the shelter.

"I think it's a neat way to get people aware that there are homeless people in Manhattan," she said. "It's neat how we work together and put in time to raise money. We all care."

Chapman Semple said she appreciates that Silver Key continues the fund-raising event every year.

"It's wonderful awareness, and it's essential to the community, especially as the community grows," she said. "We're having a tough time keeping up."

CAREER | Applicants should do research, be ready to interview

The Brooke Corportation had a booth at the fair, encouraging students from backgrounds like marketing, accounting, financing and human resources to apply.

However, the company is open to students of all majors.

"Insurance is something you can learn," Alvarado said. "Just come ready with good questions and a clear goal of what you are hoping to gain from our company."

Preparation and research are necessary for a successful visit to the fair, but being ready to talk to employers is also vital, Brantley said.

"I advise every student to have a 30-second commercial ready for the employers," she said. "Just a 'Hi my name is, and I'm interested in your business because...' It will really help them out in the long run."

The fair will continue from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m. today at Bramlage Coliseum.

about what they are doing."

Higgins had an office next to Xue and said he was a hard worker and an outstanding colleague.

Yar Ebadi, dean of the College of Business Administration, said although Xue was not a talkative person, Xue always greeted peers and worked hard.

"He was a very nice, very smart and very productive individual," Ebadi said.

Although Xue is remembered as a top-tier researcher, he was also a physically active person. Desai said Xue regularly swam at the Natatorium, jogged and enjoyed tennis and hiking.

Desai said the finance department is considering having a service and possibly creating a memorial fund in Xue's name.

The finance department also has taken measures to bring Xue's parents from China, but they have not been able to because of passport issues.

"We had the greatest respect for him in the classroom and in his research abilities," Desai said.

So drop your car keys. Start walking down that sidewalk or hop on that bicycle. Enjoy the simple beauty that is all around us. Relax and find the serenity so many of us have lost.

Don't press that button. Take the stairs. In fact, this Thursday, I say we make a new university holiday. Let's call it "K-State Takes the Stairs Day." I want everyone who is able to make the choice and do something positive for their health by taking the stairs.

Let's all be smarter and work just a little harder. You owe it to yourself to change the simple things in your daily routine so you can live a healthier life today and for years to come.

EQUICENTER | Cost estimated at $20 million for the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry, said the Foundation and the department are raising private dollars for the construction of a $10 million equine education center that would be part of the complex.

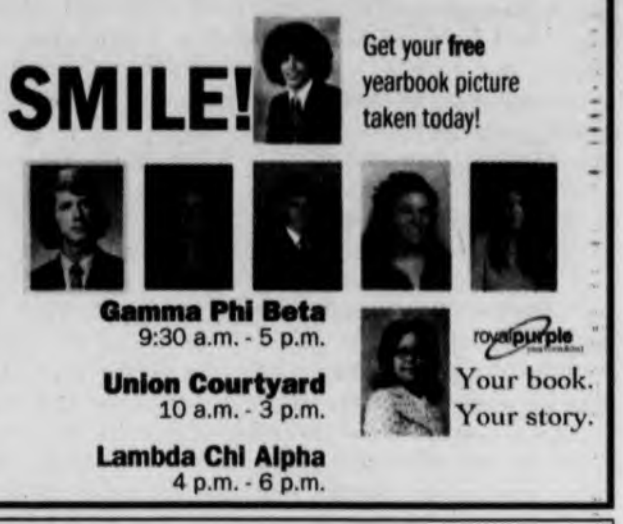
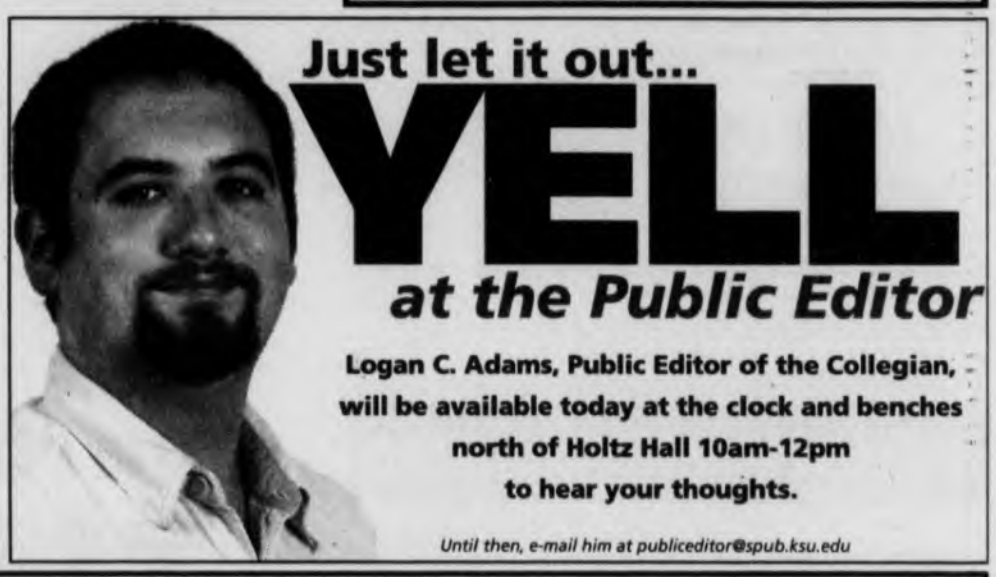
Hund said the structure would include a horse therapy center, a permanent horse stall barn, space for classrooms and open teaching areas to allow horses to be shown in classes.

John Pagen, director of economic development for the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce, said the closest comparable structures are in St. Louis and Denver.



Pagen said the proposed land for the center, 230 acres near Kimball and Denison avenues, would allow visitors to see the agricultural land surrounding the structure.

Pagen said if the feasibility report says the structure will benefit to the area, construction would begin quickly, possibly early next year.



"We have very good momentum and want to keep it going," he said. "A lot of people want to see this happen."

Investors' concern, Hund said, is whether the center can sustain itself.

"It needs to stay busy with events and not become a burden," he said. "You don't want this big white elephant sitting up there that isn't being used."

Like goes with like, especially in dating

Whether you're looking for a long-lasting relationship that might end in marriage or just casually dating, it's important to keep an open mind, but also keep yourself and your values in mind.

So when you see those beautiful people who look like models, know their significant others are likely of the same beauty caliber.

If you would rate about a six on the hotness scale, you should aim at trying to date another six. However, because the hotness scale is so subjective and can be inaccurate, allow a human error range of plus or minus one, which means a four can pursue threes, fours or fives.

This isn't to say you shouldn't try for people more beautiful than yourself, but it's fair warning to say you might get a broken heart in the end.

As far as dating at K-State, there are at least 23,000 people here. Although they might not all be single, there are still plenty to choose from.

Keep in mind that like goes with like. If you're an art student and have a great appreciation for the fine arts, you'll probably enjoy someone who shares your interests.

If you meet someone who has the same music interests, you'll have more to talk about, and you can go to concerts together.

If partying is your recreation of choice, you might be better off trying to meet someone in a bar or at a party. Just remember the activities you enjoy when looking for a mate.

An example of how things could go wrong: you are someone who loves watching animé video marathons on Saturday nights, and you go on a date with someone who hates animé and will watch German movies only on Friday nights, because Saturday nights are reserved for horseshoes with the extended family. Obviously, this relationship won't last long.

For those people who are needy and require a lot of attention and quality time, steer clear of architecture students, pre-med students or anyone who works for Student Publications Inc.; academics and extra-curricular activities demand much of their time.

If you're an expensive date and want your mate to be rolling in money, search for people in majors that have a good turnaround rate, meaning they're likely to get a good job after graduation (see engineers, lawyers, accountants and doctors) or watch for trust-funders.

Another thing to determine while perusing the dating scene is if you are even dateable, and if so, how dateable?

Dating and love can be wonderful, but they also can hurt your heart, your spirit and your body. Take advantage of college life, as it is unlikely you'll ever be around a pool of this many single, sex-charged young adults in your life again.

Single life frees from jealousy, nagging, cover-stealers

For more than two years now, I have been what some consider to be the worst thing on earth: single.

ANNETTE LAWLESS

You know the type: the third wheel, the person who doesn't take a partner to family functions or the person commonly known as your "single friend [insert name here]."

At a recent family event, I was scolded by numerous relatives about my relationship status. One asked me, "So, do you have a boyfriend yet?" My answer: "No, but graduate school is bound to have a more qualified pool of dating applicants, wouldn't you say?" Another relative said, "Gee, you are so beautiful. We are all just so surprised that you aren't married by now." My response: "Well, I turned 21 last year. I think I'll stick to drinking and fun-filled dating for now, thanks."

It's amazing to realize how much people depend on having a relationship. With this week being National Singles' Week, I have chosen to celebrate what I consider the best thing in the world – being single.

The single life is fabulous. You are free to do what you want, when you want and to date whomever you want. Nobody can stop you from being anything but yourself. It's a great time to just sit back, take things easy and have a good time. And on that note, here are my top 20 reasons why everyone should celebrate being single with me.

1. You don't have to watch your partner's Monday night football games or back-to-back viewings of any Lifetime Original Movie.

2. Shaving on a regular basis is completely optional.

3. You only have to clean when you feel like it, and you don't have to clean up after someone else.

4. You are free to do whatever the hell you want. Go on a road trip or out on the town. You don't have to check in with anyone. And, with that, you automatically become the envy of any couple around you.

5. There is nobody to steal the covers, and your morning breath affects no one.

6. There are no anniversaries, birthdays or holidays to remember. No flowers, cards or jewelry to buy. Single life is truly for those on a budget.

7. Your cell phone is no longer an electronic leash.

8. The hot water in the shower is yours. You could stay in there for hours and it wouldn't matter.

9. You have the God-given right to pet ownership. No questions, no excuses. Single people and cats, or any other animal of choice, are like peanut butter and jelly.

10. There is no one to hog the car radio.

11. Good junk food lasts twice as long.

12. You are free to check out any hottie you see in Aggieville.

13. Every night is boys' or girls' night out.

14. Jealousy? Never heard of it.

15. You know exactly who has been using your razor or toothbrush.

16. Your mom is the only person who nags you.

17. Toilet seat up or down – you decide.

18. When you find $20 in the washing machine, it is automatically yours, no questions asked.

19. You don't have to worry when you fart, burp or snore.

20. You can walk around the house in your underwear (or less) without it being considered an invitation.

Are you dateable? And what to do if not Ready to date?

1. Do you enjoy cuddling and long for someone with whom to spend time?

No — Your only hope is a pet rock or plant.

Yes — Go on to question two.

2. Are you looking for someone who's more than arm candy at a date party and more than just a "good time" later that night?

No — Stay single; it's better for everyone.

Yes — Go on to question three (getting closer).

3. Do you want to give or be given flowers from time to time, and are you excited to write love notes?

Yes — Go on to question four (so far you're looking very good).

4. Are you living in your parents' basement? Or are you still driving their car?

No — Excellent. Go on to question five.

Yes — You're going to be less marketable if you're still dependent on your parents. Consider at least making plans to move out eventually or buy a car.

5. Are you willing to share your toothbrush and give up your favorite weekend pastime for chick flicks or NASCAR?

No — You're dateable but not marriage material yet.

Yes — You are totally dateable. However, be careful. You probably have men or women crawling all over you right now.

If you made it all the way through question five, congratulations. You're ready for the world of dating.

Tips for 1st-time daters or people who constantly screw up the 1st date:

1. Don't spend the night together on the first date. You'll both have more respect for each other the next morning.

2. Try to find an activity you both appreciate. Save outlet shopping or Xbox for later in the relationship, when you're committed enough to make each other miserable.

3. If possible, try to do an activity that involves mutual friends. Having close friends around can help ease nervousness. You two can sneak off alone later in the date.

4. Try to be mindful of each other's views and opinions. It's probably not a good plan to debate politics or reproductive rights on a first date, unless it's clearly evident you both support a candidate or idea.

5. Finally, relax and have fun. Don't throw too much insight into the event. Don't judge the person like he or she will be your future husband or wife. First impressions are always shaky, and it takes a lot more than a first date to make a spouse.

700 forget to change eID password

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Information Technology Assistance Center received a record 689 phone calls on Sept. 14, after students and faculty forgot to change their K-State eID passwords before the Sept. 13 deadline.

Rebecca Gould, director of ITAC, said the help desk worked to assist faculty and students in changing their eIDs passwords.

Gould said e-mails to change passwords were sent to students on Sept. 12 and 13, and notices were posted on the K-State Web site and on the eprofile page.

How to change an eID password:
For missed password deadlines, students and staff can visit the eID Web site at eid.k-state.edu, click on "Missed a password deadline?" and fill out a short form to get passwords reactivated.

Before future deadlines, Gould said she would like to work with news media and students to figure out how to inform everyone. One possibility is sending a few consistent e-mails.

Tania Tapanes, freshman in biology, said she tried to search on K-State Online and could not sign in. Tapanes said she did not know what to do until a friend told her she had to change her password for her eID.

Repairs lower Call Hall ice cream stock

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Summer repairs at the Dairy Processing Plant at K-State have created a shortage in the plant's ice cream stock.

The repairs to the refrigeration system have made it difficult to fill the normal stock of ice cream, said Lori McVay, dairy plant manager and research assistant for animal sciences and industry.

The plant produces ice cream once a week and can make about five new flavors during that time to try to refill the stock, McVay said.

She said the plant's refrigeration system was down from the middle of July until the last week of August. When the refrigeration system that operates all the walk-in freezers and coolers went down, there was no place to store ice cream, and it had to be put in an emergency freezer.

"Demand is really strong for the ice cream," McVay said. "And it will take until the first of next year to get back to normal inventory levels. We're trying the best we can."

She said the plant is trying to keep the core flavors in stock and slowly add other flavors.

"Even on normal rotations of flavors, certain flavors sell out fast, such

Snyder highway honors coach

By Megan Moser
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

If you want former football coach Bill Snyder's autograph, get a speeding ticket.

Snyder promised to autograph the first one issued on the portion of highway named for him during a dedication ceremony Wednesday morning at Bosco Student Plaza.

As the winningest coach in K-State history, Snyder said he was lucky to have a great 17-year career with the Wildcats.

"This community and this state have drawn closer together in that period of time," he said. "This highway ties it all together. It leads through our state and through our community."

Gov. Kathleen Sebelius flew in for the ceremony.

"Nobody has had more impact on this school and this state than coach Snyder," Sebelius said. "Congratulations, coach."

Also in attendance were Secretary of Transportation, Deb Miller and state Reps. Lee Tafanelli, Sydney Carlin and Tom Hawk.

Rep. Ed O'Malley, R-Roeland Park, Kan., a K-State alumnus, spoke at the dedication.

"I wish every piece of legislation was as easy to pass as the Coach Snyder Highway Legislation," O'Malley said.

Snyder said the vote for the bill was almost unanimous.

"There was one dissenting vote – a KU graduate," Snyder said. "I sent her a note, and she apologized. I said that both schools were awfully good, so she didn't have anything to be ashamed of."

Several of Snyder's family members were present for the ceremony and helped with the unveiling of the signs.

Pep song to be cut if fans don't avoid profanity

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Fans must cut profanity from a popular chant if they want to keep the tradition, Frank Tracz, director of bands, said.

Students have changed "We're gonna beat the heck out of you" to "We're gonna beat the f--- out of you" in "Rock and Roll Part 2," better known as "The Hey Song."

Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said he was surprised when his wife and daughter mentioned the profanity in the student section at Saturday's game against Marshall.

"I didn't believe what I was hearing coming out of our student section," he said.

Alumni expressed concern about the profanity in the chant after they heard it echo across the stadium last Saturday, Tracz said. E-mails were sent to Tracz, members of the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics and K-State administration.

After much consideration, Tracz said he decided the band will quit playing the song if the student body continues to chant the profanity at Saturday's game against Louisville. However, he said it is not a choice he wants to make.

"If I eliminate the tune and don't play it, they are just going to use that word in some other cheer we do," he said. "I don't want to stop playing it because of idiots in the audience who choose to be jerks."

Instead, Tracz is calling for a change in behavior.

"If enough of us that are doing the right thing for the right reason would turn and say, 'This is no longer OK. Stop it,' I think we could

Finalists in Alltel's fan contest campaign for votes

By Megan Molitor
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's not a popularity contest – it's a showing of school spirit.

The Alltel Wireless is sponsoring a "My Own Game" contest in which students campaign for votes to determine the biggest K-State fan.

According to www.alltel-vote.com, the grand-prize winner will receive a Samsung HDTV, a Samsung MP3 player, 11 home game tickets and a home football game named after the winner.

The Web site said students wanting to participate must have first submitted a 500-word essay on why they should be the winner and a 50-word statement on why the game should be named for them.

Ten finalists were then selected and notified. Their 50-word statements and their photographs appear on the Web site. On Sept. 16, the voting period began.

Through Sept. 23, people can visit the Web site and vote for the candidate they think shows the most school spirit.

Many candidates saw the advertisement for the contest in the Collegian.

"I saw the ad in the paper and went to the Web site to sign up," said Brock Baxter, finalist and senior in civil engineering. "I campaigned Saturday at the game for votes, and the person with the most votes at the end of that day won $1,000."

Baxter said he is excited for the chance to bring 10 people with him to the skybox and to have a home game named for him.

"I'm getting a lot of help from other people to get votes," he said. "It's really hard to tell what kind of a change I have so far though."

Nathan Gorrell, candidate and K-State-Salina senior in professional pilot and aviation maintenance, is getting his friends to vote as often as possible, as each can vote as many as 2,000 times.

"It's not like politics where you just vote once, so I'm getting a lot of my buddies together to vote as much as they can," Gorrell said. "I hadn't heard anything about it prior to entering, so I thought I had a better chance. I still think I do."

Gorrell said he thinks it would be an experience of a lifetime to receive the winner VIP treatment.

"It would be the ultimate gameday experience," Gorrell said. "It would leave great memories to have a game named after me."

Candidate Ian Tillinghast said he agreed but is looking forward to sharing the memories with others.

"I always tailgate with my parents, and they spend a lot of money on it for every game," said Tillinghast, senior in milling science and management. "It'd be great if they could just relax with me for once and to take them to sit in the box seats with me and my friends."

He said he is enjoying the contest, because all he has to do is be a K-State fan.

"All the contestants are diehard fans, so we all have a good chance," Tillinghast said.

All students can vote and, in doing so, are entered to win other prizes from Alltel.

USD 383 doesn't perform random drug tests; USD 490 does

By Adrianne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

MANHATTAN-OGDEN USD 383 POLICY

USD 383's Board of Education student conduct policy, approved in May 2005, says "each principal shall develop rules and regulations to govern student conduct consistent with board policies."

The district's policy on drug-free schools, also approved in May 2005, in part states "maintaining drug-free schools is important in establishing an appropriate learning environment for the district's students."

Dwight D. Eisenhower Middle School does not perform random drug testing, Principal Greg Hoyt said.

"We don't even have drug-testing kits on site," Hoyt said. "We don't randomly screen those participating in events or those in attendance."

Hoyt said students are required to attend after-school events immediately after the school day has ended and are not allowed re-admittance after the event has started.

Vickie Kline, Susan B. Anthony Middle School principal, said the school's after-school event policies are the same as those at Dwight D. Eisenhower.

Terry McCarty, Manhattan High School principal, was not available for comment at press time.

USD 490/EL DORADO POLICY

USD 490 Board of Education approved the random drug-testing policy after it determined that the use of alcohol, tobacco and illegal drugs was a problem in grades 7 through 12, according to the policy document at www.eldoradoschools.org.

This was based on information gathered from the student body and other reliable sources, according to the policy.

All students in grades 7 through 12 who participate in school-sponsored activities will be subject to the testing program.

The policy says school-sponsored activities include the following:

- competitive and non-competitive extracurricular activities
- school dances
- being a spectator at extracurricular activities
- parking privileges on USD 490 property

The previous policy stated that if students were found with alcohol, tobacco or illegal drugs, they could not participate in a competition for 12 days, said Dave Adams, El Dorado city police officer and father of a 17-year-old El Dorado High School student. Students could, however, practice, stand on the sidelines and travel with the team.

"I thought they encouraged bad behavior and had no teeth," Adams, a 1978 K-State graduate, said of the previous policy. "When I was in school in the 1970s at El Dorado, if you got caught breaking training rules, you were removed from the team."

The policy originally was introduced by students to USD 490's school board in 1999, according to a Sept. 3 article in the Wichita Eagle.

USD 490 Superintendent Tom Biggs, who was not available for comment at press time, told the Eagle the policy was set aside in 1999 due to drug-testing costs.

USD 490 will pay $25 per student per drug test and plans to spend $10,000 to $12,000 on the tests, according to the Wichita Eagle article.

The federal government awarded $7.5 million in grants in 2005 to help schools start drug-testing programs, according to a Sept. 13 report at CNN.com.

Matt Wagner, 2003 graduate of El Dorado High School, said there was a noticeable problem with substance abuse during his high school career.

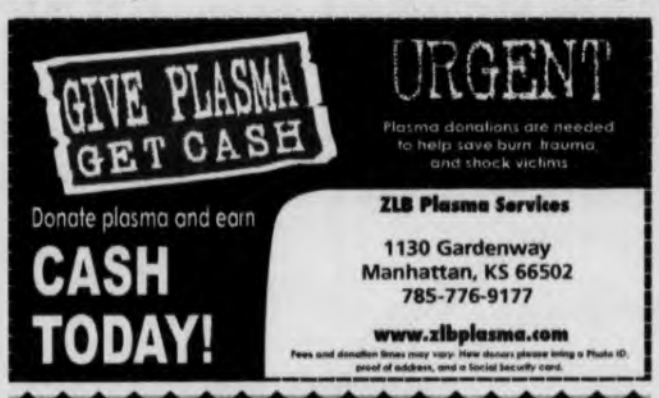
"It probably needed to be a more definite policy in activities that people participated in," said Wagner, senior in management information systems.

However, Wagner said signing a consent form to random drug tests in order to park in the high school's parking lot is too much.

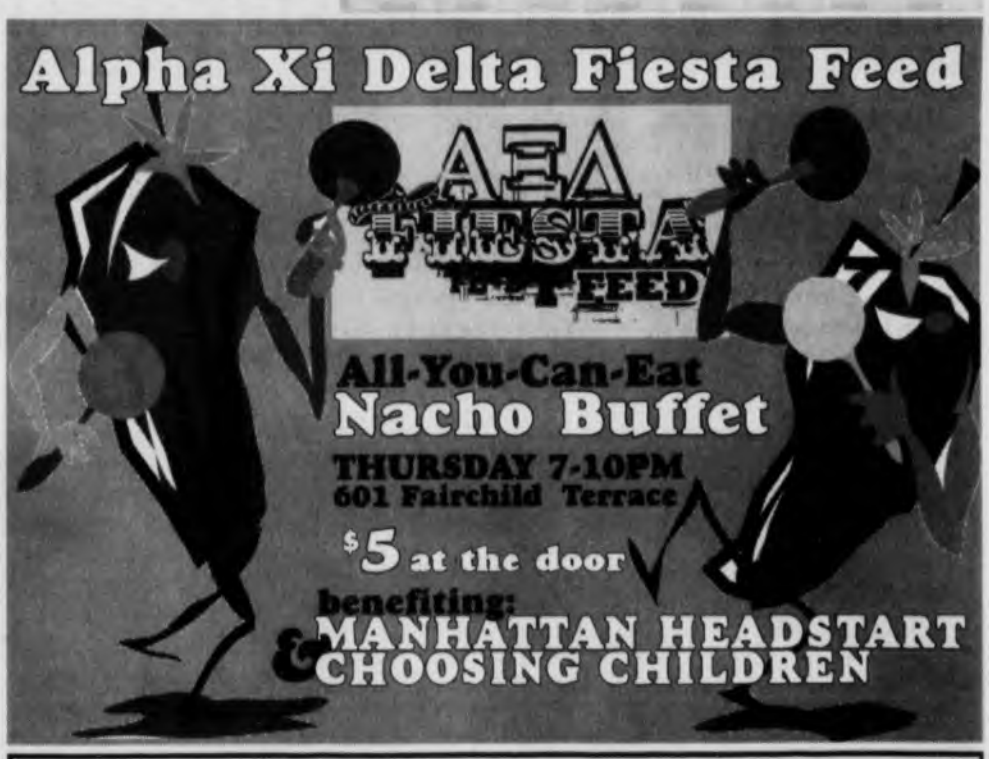
"There's a legitimacy in what the school district should be legislating," he said. "Maybe city police should be involved in drug testing. If they are requiring it of students, why can't they require it for faculty, staff and administrators?"

In the state of Kansas, Adams said it is a privilege, not a law-given rigth, to park a car in a parking lot.

Adams said he does not think the new policy will decrease participation or attendance in the schools' extracurricular activities.



"Those complaining about it were those who weren't attending or participating in the events anyway," he said.



Wagner said he is not sure if the new policy will affect participation and attendance in activities.

"I think that those who object to signing the forms will allot their time in other ways," Wagner said. "Also, I think what they'll see in future years is that if a student is attending class and that's all they're allowed to do, and if they're not allowed to participate in the activities, how are they going to develop socially?"

Religion and rage

Drawing Muslims' ire, Pope argues evangelism through violence contradicts God's nature

Adherents to the religion of peace are up to their peaceful ways again.

This time, they are seeking to assert their peacefulness through olive branch acts like gunning down a nun in a Somalian children's hospital, firebombing Christian churches in Gaza, and calling for the (holy) execution of Pope Benedict XVI.

KODY COOPER

This most recent eruption of peaceful activity was spurred by the Pope's recent speech on reason and faith. In the speech, Benedict XVI quoted a medieval Byzantine emperor, Manuel II Paleologus, who wrote:

"Show me just what Mohammed brought that was new, and there you will find things only evil and inhumane, such as his command to spread by the sword the faith he preached."

It did not matter that Benedict XVI stressed that these words were "brusque" or that they were not even his own. It did not matter that the speech actually encourages interfaith dialogue.

As soon as Mohammed (peace be upon him) was mentioned in the same breath as "evil and inhumane" (Allah forbid), the response consisted of the "(holy) and (humane)" acts of riot, arson and murder.

The events conjure up fond memories of how religionists of peace responded to those "bombastic" cartoon portrayals of the Prophet Mohammed in Danish newspapers. Their nonviolent response amounted to mass rioting, the burning of multiple embassies in Syria and Lebanon, and more than 100 deaths.

Iranian peace-seeking religionist and newspaper editor Farid Mortazavi developed this ethic of international bridge-building by calling for a Holocaust denial cartoon contest. Apparently the idea was to show the religionists of peace deep respect for peaceful regimes like Nazi Germany.

Now, one might object that such acts only implicate a minority of religionists of peace, and that, in fact, many Muslims reject the perversion of their religion by extremists.

Fine. But this "perversion" is precisely what the Holy Father is critiquing. And there are many powerful, influential imams, mullahs and jihadis that do construe Mohammed's teachings as violently conversionist.

The Pope's point isn't whether that construction is in fact fair to Mohammed (the intra-Islam debate rages on). Rather, he is merely pointing out that this construction is in fact unreasonable.

Why? Benedict XVI argues that evangelism through violence is self-evidently unreasonable and thus contrary to the nature of God. This is because reason and God's nature are inextricably linked.

"In the Beginning was the Word. And the Word was with God. And the Word was God" (John 1:1). "Word" is translated from the Greek "logos," which means both word and reason. As Benedict XVI explains: "In the beginning was the logos, and the logos is God."

Christianity is thus a religion that always has identified itself as reasonable, and those who commit violent evangelism in its name are grossly misguided.

The Pope's argument becomes clear. A construction of Mohammed's teachings that praises religiously motivated violence is inherently unreasonable. Such is to act without logos. Such is to act contrary to God's nature.

Benedict XVI believes any interfaith dialogue between Christianity and Islam would presuppose agreement on this fundamental point.

So, as we hear calls for war on the "cross worshippers" echoing from the al-Qaeda types, we should respond as Benedict XVI responds – with an invitation to a Christian understanding of God: "It is to this great logos, to this breadth of reason, that we invite our partners in the dialogue of cultures."

Imagine the horror of being killed for simply being who you are.

According to an article in the Advocate, a gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender news source, many gays and lesbians in Iraq are facing such a threat.

LOLA SHRIMPLIN

The Iraqi Lesbian-Bi-Gay-Transsexual (LBGT) is calling for help from the U.S. government and the United Kingdom to stop the slaughter, but no one seems to be listening.

Why aren't we listening? Matthew Shepard was killed here, simply for being who he was, and the outpouring of grief was tremendous.

So maybe that's why we're ignoring the murders.

"The Iraqi political system seems to move from bad to worse into a catastrophe of human rights violations to include gay and lesbian rights violations with reports of torturing, imprisonment and killing," the Iraqi LBGT site states.

I thought we were going over to Iraq to install a democracy, in which people could live free of the fear of being imprisoned or tortured.

I thought the whole point of going there was to depose Saddam Hussein and install a government in which people could rule themselves.

It seems all we have done is create a place where no one is safe, especially those who are most vulnerable.

Apparently, the Iraqi government and the Badr Islamic organization, who the United States and the United Kingdom support, is carrying out mass genocide on people of homosexual persuasion.

In the 1930s, Nazi Germany began a policy of racial purification, and it targeted Jews, Catholics and of course, homosexuals.

The difference this time is that it's the United States' fault for importing Western values and the work of the devil, at least according to Iraq's chief Shiite cleric, Ali al-Sistani.

He placed a fatwa calling for death to gay men in Iraq, then removed it, but left it in place as far as lesbians are concerned.

This is supposed to be our enemy, isn't it? We are supposed to stand for truth, justice and the American Way, aren't we?

Is the American way mass genocide and torture? Because that's what is going on in Iraq, according to Iraqis who have escaped to London and Jordan.

"We are calling for the United Kingdom and the United States' government to protect all the Iraqi gay, lesbians, bisexuals and transgender inside Iraq and outside Iraq," the Iraqi LGBT Web site says.

If we're going to be the world's liberator and the world's police, then we need to protect as well as take apart.

Drug-testing policies must apply equally, can't isolate lower-risk, more involved youth

It's no surprise that substance use and abuse is a problem that faces high school students.

To battle this, the USD 490 Board of Education approved a policy that would allow for random drug testing in grades 7 through 12.

Only students in those grades who participate in school-sponsored activities will be subject to the testing.

School-sponsored activities include competitive and non-competitive extracurricular activities, school dances, being a spectator at extracurricular activities and parking privileges on USD 490 property.

It seems as if the only students who don't fall in these categories are the ones most likely to be found smoking joints on their lunch breaks.

This policy should be changed to apply to all students, especially students who lack social support groups.

We feel, from our experiences in high school, that the students who were busy being involved in their schools usually had schedules to full to turn to drugs.

Additionally, those students have support groups and reasons to stay off drugs.

We understand that substance abuse is a problem and should not be ignored, but the students who aren't involved shouldn't be ignored either.

Individuals' self interests cannot be defined by experts removed from each person's life

Editor,

In his guest column on Sept. 18, Dr. Hedrick offers that we – as citizens in general and as students in particular – think, act and vote against our own self interests. Rather than his stated premise, what Dr. Hedrick seems to mean is "citizens, in general, and students, in particular, think, act and vote against their own self interests as defined by Dr. Hedrick, Thomas Frank, or (fill in your own expert of choice here)."

I find this infuriating. I don't need Dr. Hedrick, Thomas Frank or any other expert to tell me what my self interests are. I've voted for some taxes and against others. I've supported some charitable enterprises and not others. I've served my time in Korea, Iraq and other places and knew exactly who I was fighting and why.

My brothers, sister and I all have earned our college degrees without the use of student loans, an accomplishment Dr. Hedrick implies is not attainable. (No, Mom and Dad didn't pay for it, and we don't have a trust fund.) I would much rather determine my own self interests than have someone who has never met me, my wife or my children define those interests for us. Under the category of "Wisdom from Momma," that comes out as "Mind your own business."

Profanities, insults yelled by K-State fans illustrate bigotry, harm school's reputation

Editor,

Why does it seem like our culture says it is OK to shout profanities and other derogatory terms at opposing players and/or teams during sporting events? I went to the Marshall game this past weekend, and the people behind me were shouting things like "f--- you, number 23" or "you should die, number 77" or "kill him."

Then they began to bash our own team. When someone dropped a pass, they would shout, "you suck," "take him off the field." When a play the coach called only merited a yard or two, they started shouting profanities at coach Prince.

I have gone to games at several different Big 12 venues, and I am ashamed to say that at K-State, some of the fans are of the lowest there are. If you are wishing a player to die just because he goes to a different school, that isn't pride for your own school. That is 100 percent bigotry, which I thought we, as Americans, had gotten away from.

It is the same mentality Hitler had with the "perfect race." It is the same mentality that members of the Ku Klux Klan had with "white power." It makes me sad that if I want to go to a mere football game and support my school, I have to tolerate the people all around me that are definitely giving a bad name to K-State.

Board votes to end sales tax

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The USD 383 Manhattan-Ogden school board voted 4-3 late Wednesday to end the sales tax benefitting schools.

The board voted on the motion to end the tax effective Dec. 31 or at the earliest possible convenience.

"We borrowed against the well of public trust," said board member Randy Martin, who voted to end the sales tax.

Originally, some members wanted to end the tax on Dec. 31, but Pete Paukstelis argued that the loss of the money would be detrimental to the school system with the expansion of Fort Riley and the resulting influx of students into the area.

"By ending the sales tax, we lose a lot of flexibility," Paukstelis said.

He did, however, support ending the tax by June 30, 2007, a date with which Martin could not agree.

The school board shouldn't balance the budget on the back of the sales tax, Martin said.

Also discussed at the meeting was the expansion of Fort Riley. John Armbrust, executive director for Gov. Kathleen Sebelius' Strategic Military Planning Commission, spoke on expected growth in the region.

By 2011, the Fort Riley will gain 9,000 soldiers, who will bring with them 11,000 to 12,000 family members, Armbrust said.

"They're all still coming," he said.

Armbrust said 8,000 to 9,000 students will attend regional schools.

About 4,000 soldiers have arrived so far, but many are younger and unmarried, Armbrust said.

More older soldiers, many married with children through high-school age, will arrive soon, he said.

"I guess the issue is, there's more to come," Beth Tatarko, board vice president, said.

Using technology as excuse for ignoring peers decreases personal contact abilities

Editor,

I agree with Steinert in her column "Technology hinders communication" (Sept. 15). She touches on a deeper issue regarding the fact that we might lose the ability to reach out to each other face to face.

We use "communication enhancement" technology to justify ignoring someone we sit next to in class or see while walking to class, because we're uncomfortable. Why are we so uncomfortable with people we don't know or who are different from us?

I used this column as a teaching tool in an oral communication class. It generated a lot of interesting discussion.

Wildcats lose 3rd straight to Mizzou, end 4-game home winning streak

By Jeffrey Rake
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's volleyball team returned to action Wednesday night against the No. 22-ranked Missouri Tigers, hoping a week off would help get it back to its winning ways.

Instead, the Wildcats (8-4, 0-2 Big 12) lost their third-straight match, 1-3 (22-30, 27-30, 31-29, 25-30), snapping a four-game winning streak at Ahearn Field House.

The loss was the Wildcats' third straight to the Tigers dating back to last season. Coach Suzie Fritz said her team has been plagued by inconsistency, and it needs to learn to sustain a level of execution if it is to have success.

"It's like we're riding some kind of carnival ride right now," Fritz said. "We're not disciplined enough over time, and we haven't had a high enough level of performance."

The Wildcats lost the first two games and found themselves trying to scrape back into the match. In the third game, the two teams exchanged leads throughout the game before Missouri eventually got to match point, 26-29.

But the Wildcats scored five straight points to take the game 31-29. Senior Sandy Werner made some critical kills during that stretch run and gave her team some hope.

"I thought the comeback we were able to put together when we were literally down and out was a huge positive," Fritz said.

The Wildcats were unable to build off that momentum, however, dropping the fourth game 25-30. They finished the game with 27 errors, including 11 service errors, many of them occurring late in the games.

Lastra said the loss was a frustrating one to take, because she felt her team had prepared well enough to win.

"I thought we were ready to go," Lastra said. "We were working for this all week, but unfortunately, we just weren't able to execute the way we wanted to."

The loss puts the Wildcats at 0-2 overall in the Big 12 heading into their match Friday at Texas A&M. Werner said the team has plenty of confidence now, and it needs to put together a complete game from beginning to end.

"I think we are ready to compete again," Werner said. "Hopefully we can show that we can fight and play hard for the entire match."

Catrina Rawson | COLLEGIAN

K-State sophomore Angie Lastra looks away in disappointment after losing a point Wednesday evening in the Wildcats' 3-1 loss to Missouri. The Wildcats dropped to 0-2 in the Big 12 Conference.

Listen to Snyder: profanity has no place at games

CEDRIQUE FLEMMING

Who enjoys singing along with those wonderful tunes the K-State band plays during the home football games?

That was one of my favorite parts of attending the games during the three years I sat in the student section.

The K-State Fight Song, the "Wabash Cannonball," "Happy Trails" and the K-State Alma Mater are all staple music pieces played by the Pride of Wildcat Land.

Now the band is threatening to eliminate "Rock and Roll Part 2," better known as "The Hey Song," which has taken fire after the first three games of the season.

Most K-State football fans who know the ending would finish the song with the phrase, "We're gonna beat the heck out of you."

The problem is some fans replace those lyrics with "we're gonna beat the f--- out of you," and they express the harsh words to the opposing team that is directly in front of the student section.

If fans continue to use expletives, then the band will have to stop playing the songs that provoke the cursing, namely "The Hey Song."

The band should be able to play whatever it wants; it's up to the fans to be more respectful of the opposing teams that enter Snyder Family Stadium.

The word "family" in the name of the stadium is supposed to be a symbol for K-State and its fans. The people sitting in the stands should understand that in order to uphold that symbol, they need to grow up and enjoy the game in a more respectful manner.

The man for whom the stadium is named, legendary former Wildcat coach Bill Snyder, also had something to say about the use of curse words by fans.

"There is a time and a place for everything, and I certainly don't condone foul language," Snyder said. "I may be somewhat conservative, but I think foul language is inappropriate."

Listen to the man, Wildcat fans, because he obviously knows what he is talking about.

For all the fans who cheer respectfully, I thank you.

But for those who use this negative language, the game this weekend is going to be nationally televised, and all the decent fans would appreciate it if you didn't make K-State look stupid and ignorant.

Let's go back to the days when the people in Manhattan were known as the "best fans in the Big 12 Conference" – because that is not our reputation right now.

CBK | K-State, Huggins to have basketball clinic in November

Legendary coaches Gene Keady and Charlie Spoonhour, along with current Wildcat mentor Bob Huggins, will be the featured speakers at the annual K-State men's basketball coaching clinic, which is set for Saturday, Nov. 4 at Bramlage Coliseum.

Huggins

The clinic, which will begin at 8 a.m., will include presentations by Keady, Spoonhour, former Wildcat and current Cloud County Community College head coach Kevin Muff, as well as Huggins and his coaching staff. Clinic participants will be able to attend the pre-game workout and shootaround prior to K-State's exhibition game with Washburn.

The cost of the clinic is $90, which not only includes admission to the clinic, lunch, parking and pre-game workout and shootaround observation. The cost with a game ticket to the exhibition game is $100. The cost for additional staff members is $70 ($80 with a game ticket).

A native Kansan, Keady became one of the winningest coaches in Big 10 history during his 25-year tenure at Purdue. He guided the Boilermakers to over 500 victories, 18 NCAA Tournament appearances and six Big Ten titles. He was named Big Ten Coach of the Year on a record seven occasions, while he was National Coach of the Year four times. A football and baseball lettermen at Kansas State, he earned his bachelor's and master's degrees from the university in 1958 and 1964.

Inducted into the National Basketball Hall of Fame in 1997, Spoonhour compiled 750 wins and a .707 winning percentage during his 38-year coaching career, which spanned the high school, community college and university ranks. He coached nearly 20 years at the Division I level, including nine years at Missouri State, seven at Saint Louis and three at UNLV. A noted broadcaster, he is also a member of the Missouri Sports Hall of Fame and National Junior College Basketball Hall of Fame.

A basketball lettermen at Kansas State from 1984-86, Muff is currently the head coach at Cloud County Community College in Concordia, Kan. Last year, Muff guided the Thunderbirds to a 24-9 overall record and a share of the Western Division title in the Kansas Jayhawk Community College Conference.

Individuals can register for the coaching clinic by sending a check payable to Huggins Enterprises to the men's basketball office at 1800 College Avenue, Bramlage Coliseum, Suite 133, Manhattan, KS 66502 or online at www.kstatesports.com or inside.kstatesports.com/mbb.

STRAFFAN, Ireland — Tiger Woods was outraged Wednesday at an Irish magazine and a tabloid that linked photos of his wife to various pornography sites, and his agent was studying the merits of a lawsuit.

Woods

The publisher, Dubliner Media Limited, issued an apology saying it was a satire and didn't expect anyone to take it seriously.

Woods was among those who did.

"My wife, yes, she has been a model prior, and she did do some bikini photos," Woods said. "But to link her to porn Web sites is unacceptable, and I do not accept that at all. Neither does our team."

The Dubliner magazine wrote in its September issue about Elin Nordegren, his Swedish wife of nearly two years.

"Most American golfers are married to women who cannot keep their clothes on in public," the magazine wrote. "Is it too much to ask that they leave them at home for the Ryder Cup? Consider the evidence. Tiger Woods' wife can be found in a variety of sweaty poses on porn sites."

The Irish Daily Star gave it front-page treatment Wednesday with the headline, "Tiger's Fury at Naked Pictures."

Inside the tabloid, it reprinted photos of Nordegren in a bikini, along with a nude photo of a woman purported to be Nordegren. Woods vehemently denied it was his wife when it first came out three years ago.

CBK | 2nd man turns himself in shooting of Duquesne players

PITTSBURGH — A second man charged in a shooting that wounded five Duquesne University basketball players turned himself in Wednesday, police said.

William Holmes, 18, of the Pittsburgh suburb of Penn Hills, was to be arraigned later Wednesday on charges of attempted homicide, aggravated assault, criminal conspiracy and weapons-related offenses.

Holmes is the third person arrested in Sunday's shooting after a dance at the private, Roman Catholic university. Two of the wounded players remained hospitalized, with one critically injured.

The other man charged in the shooting, Brandon Baynes, was arraigned on five counts of criminal attempt at homicide on Tuesday.

Prosecutors also filed charges of aggravated assault, criminal conspiracy and weapons counts against Baynes, 19, who was still in custody after being arrested Tuesday.

Farm safety week focuses on lighting, seat belts

By Megan Moser and Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

America's most dangerous occupation is not fire fighting or construction work – it's farming.

In 2005, there were 710 fatalities related to farming, or 29.2 deaths per 1,000 workers, according to Dan Neenan, manager for the National Education Center for Agricultural Safety.

Sept. 17-23 is the 63rd annual National Farm Safety Week. This year's theme is Prepare to Prevent.

"It was placed at this time of year because of the fall harvest," Neenan said. "People are out working with dangerous machines like combines, augers and tractors."

NECAS held Fall Harvest Safety Days with FFA clubs last week and worked with fire departments to teach agriculture rescue. They also conducted tractor rollover classes.

Neenan said one safety concern with the onset of the fall harvest is that of proper lighting. He said farm workers should make sure that lights on the front of vehicles function properly and that slow-moving vehicle and other reflective stickers still reflect light.

"Some of the SMVs that you see out there have lost their reflectivity altogether," Neenan said. "You can just put a new sticker on top of the old for a $5-$10 investment at a farm store."

He said another large concern, not just for farmers but for all drivers, is driving on dirt roads.

"Kids today are driving on raw roads and a lot of the time are talking on their phones," he said. "They don't realize how fast they are coming up on farm vehicles."

Neenan said farm workers should inspect their equipment often and make sure to replace guards and shields to prevent things from getting caught.

Farm safety is a state concern, as well. In 2000, 16 Kansans were killed in agriculture-related accidents. Of those, eight were in the production of crops, five were livestock-related and six involved tractors, according to the K-State Agricultural Safety & Health Program Web site.

In tractor safety, one seat means one rider, said Kerri Ebert, extension assistant for the agricultural safety and health program at K-State.

Newer tractors that have buddy seats with a seat belt and roll-over cab protection are approved for farmers who have their child ride with them, but older tractors or combines that have only a driver's seat aren't safe, she said.

It is also important for farmers to keep fire extinguishers readily accessible and make sure they are the right size and type for the location.

Especially with larger farm implements like combines and tractors, a lot of dust is created when using the vehicles, which can be slick, Ebert said.

Farmers and farm workers should wear non-slip shoes with good soles so they don't fall while climbing on to or off of the implement, she said.

"Be safe," Ebert said.

The Plain Facts

- Farm equipment should be hitched properly.
- Farm tractors should not transport extra passengers.

THAI COUP LEADER SAYS NO ELECTIONS

BANGKOK, Thailand – Thailand's new military ruler, winning crucial royal backing for his bloodless coup, announced Wednesday he would not call elections for another year. The United States and other Western nations expressed disapproval and urged a swift restoration of democracy.

Army commander Gen. Sondhi Boonyaratkalin, at his first news conference since seizing power Tuesday night, said he would serve as de facto prime minister for two weeks until the junta – which calls itself the Council of Administrative Reform – chooses a civilian to replace him and drafts an interim constitution.

Sondhi sealed the success of his coup by receiving royal endorsement as leader of the new junta.

GUANTANAMO BAY NAVAL BASE, Cuba – Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, accused of masterminding the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, and other alleged terrorists linked to large attacks against the United States are expected to face hearings at the Guantanamo prison camp within three months, a military official said Wednesday.

Fourteen "high-value" detainees – including the alleged plotter of the USS Cole bombing and the alleged coordinator of the 1998 bombings of the U.S. Embassies in Kenya and Tanzania – will be invited to appear at hearings, held to determine whether they're enemy combatants, said Navy Capt. Phil Waddingham, director of the Office for the Administrative Review of the Detention of Enemy Combatants.

POPE APOLOGIZES INDIRECTLY TO MUSLIMS

VATICAN CITY – Pope Benedict XVI said Wednesday he did not mean to malign Islam when he quoted a medieval emperor, but he did not issue the direct apology still demanded by some Muslim leaders who were offended by his remarks.

During an audience in a tightly guarded St. Peter's Square, Benedict acknowledged that his comments – which sparked fury across the Muslim world – were open to misinterpretation.

In a Sept. 12 address at the University of Regensburg in Germany, Benedict cited the words of a Byzantine emperor who characterized some of the teachings of the Prophet Muhammad as "evil and inhuman," particularly "his command to spread by the sword the faith."

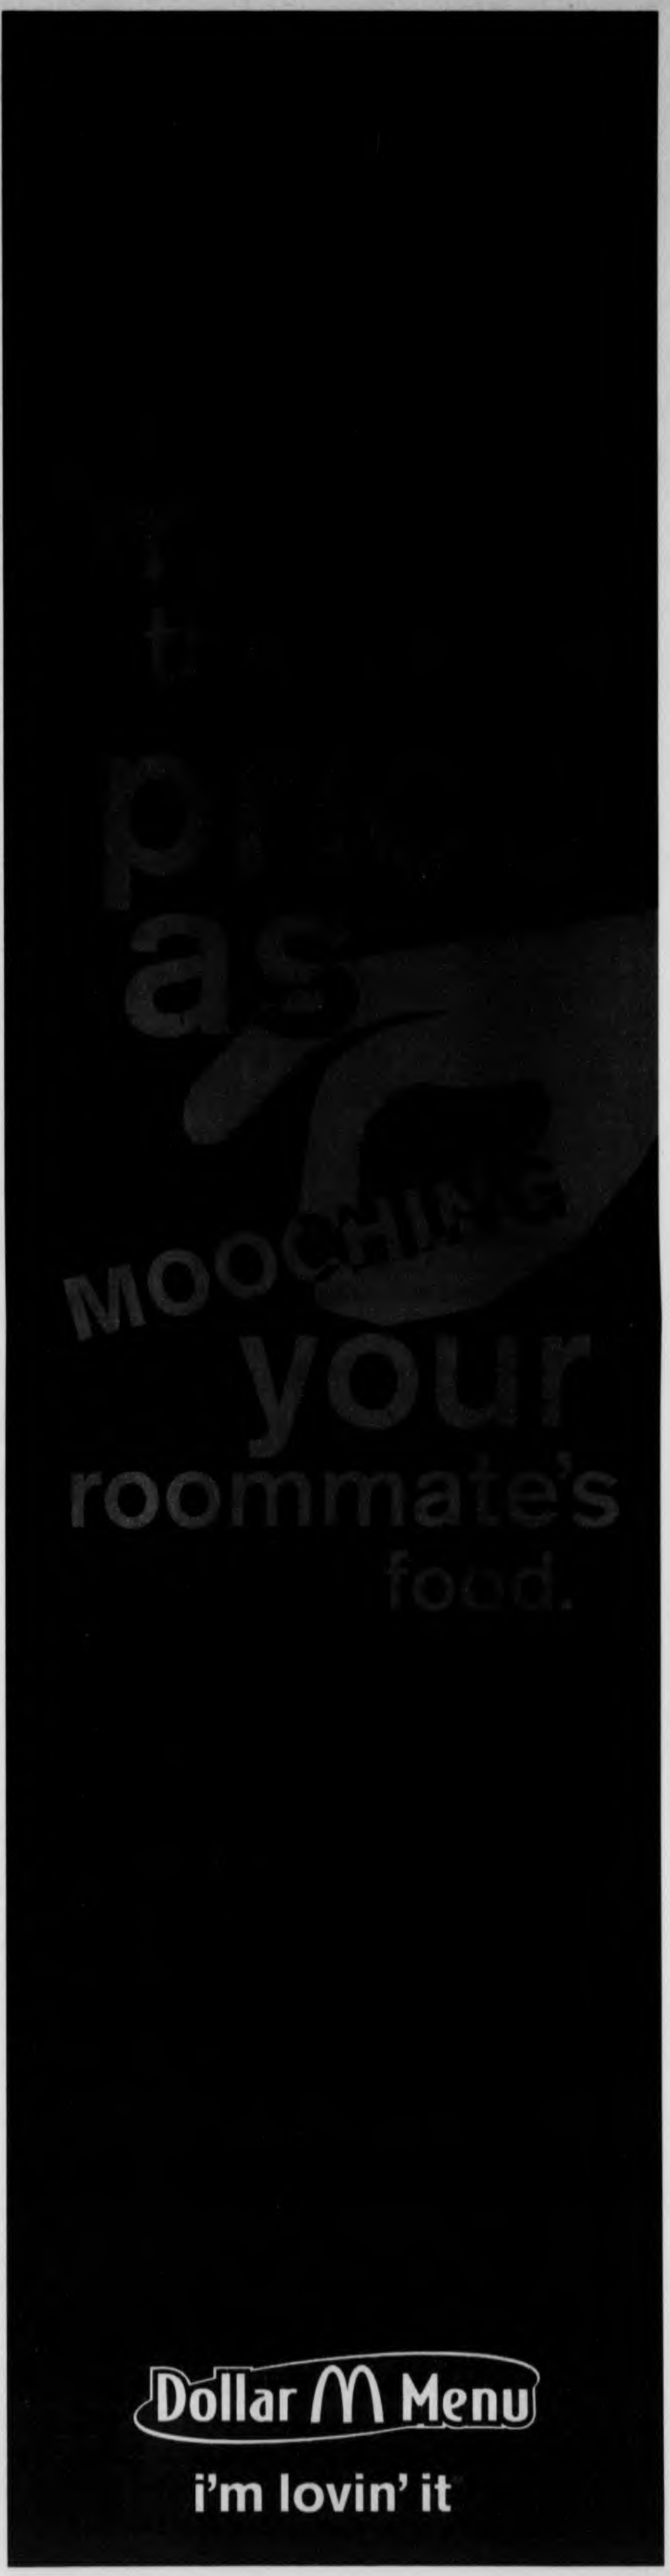
The eastbound sign is near the entrance to the Tuttle Creek Visitors' Center on U.S. Highway 24 north of Manhattan.

A second sign, northbound on Kansas Highway 177, will be located just north of the Geary-Riley county line south of Manhattan.

Taylor Courser, senior in construction science and management, said he thought the dedication was a good thing for the community.



"I've been a big fan of Bill Snyder and K-State football my whole life," he said. "I wanted to come see him and see this whole thing go down."

Snyder is widely considered to be responsible for the biggest turnaround in college football history.

Snyder was voted Big 12 Coach of the Year five times and coached 33 All-Americans.

During Snyder's time at K-State, the team ended its season in a bowl game for 11 straight seasons.

HEY SONG | Alcohol, crowd effect loosen tongues

have an effect on it, and the good voices would drown out the rotten ones," Tracz said.

Casey Scott, associate athletic director for operations, said he also could hear the lyrics with the profanity at Saturday's game and said it is unacceptable behavior.

"For the students to take on that verbage isn't classy," he said. "If it continues, then we support Frank's decision. We are not going to tolerate that kind of behavior."

This isn't the first time Bosco has heard complaints about students' language.

"I remember receiving complaints from alumni and friends of the university when our students were reciting that particular chant, and they were using the word 'hell,'" he said. "That was 10 years ago."

Chris Hancock, graduate student in poultry management, sits in the front row at football games and calls himself an avid fan. He said the language at the games has changed in his seven years at K-State.

"When I started coming, people were saying heck or hell," he said. "Now the f-bomb is the common one that I have been hearing more and more."

Snyder Family stadium is a family environment, as indicated by its name, Tracz said, and parents don't want their children exposed to profanity.

"It's pretty hard to explain to a 5-year-old, 6-year-old, 7-year-old little girl or boy why are they using the f-word and what does that mean, and it's not OK to use that. It's just not OK," Tracz said.

Hancock said he understands that families attend the football games. However, he said they should be aware of what they are getting into.

"I think I would have an understanding that I brought my child into an environment like that," he said. "If I bring my kid into that environment, they are probably going to hear some of those things even though I don't want them to. At football games, people get drunk – people get rowdy."

Tracz also referred to alcohol consumption as a cause for such behavior.

"Students are probably under the influence, and when you get in a crowd situation like that, sometimes the mob mentality takes over," he said.

Bosco said he agrees with the mob mentality theory.

"Individuals may not say the word when they are with several friends where they can be picked out, but when they're with a crowd, they become anonymous," he said.

Bosco said K-State students are lucky to be able to sit at the 50-yard line, as most campuses have moved students away from the opposing sidelines or behind the goal posts.

Student Body President Lucas Maddy said he was sitting in the general admission section with friends and heard the language coming from the student section.

A way to help students avoid profanity would be to have the cheerleaders hold up placards with the correct lyrics to the chant, Maddy said. More than a tradition would be lost if the song is pulled, he said.

"For the families, it would be the loss of a motivational song. For the students, it would be a message of disappointment," he said.

as cookie dough, purple pride and chocolate vanilla strawberry," McVay said.

In addition to Call Hall Dairy Bar, the ice cream is sold to Dara's Fast Lane and Chillie Willie's Ice Cream Parlor and is served at the residence hall dining centers, McVay said. But supplying ice cream for the dairy bar takes precedence.

She said the plant's other priorities include producing all the milk for the dining centers.

She said the shortage has hurt ice cream sales because if the plant does not have high-demand flavors, consumers buy from somewhere else.

Lavon Griffin, Chillie Willie's employee, said because of the shortage, Chillie Willie's has been limited to certain flavors from the dairy bar. The flavors available include favorites like Chocolate Brownie Delight and Swiss Mint.

To make up for lack of flavors, Chillie Willie's has had to order from Blue Bunny.

Christopher Hanewinckel | COLLEGIAN

Crystal Laslo, freshman in pre-veterinary medicine, helps Matthew Weber, freshman in construction science management, at Chillie Willie's Ice Cream Parlor in the K-State Student Union Tuesday evening.

"But while Call Hall continues to make more ice cream, we're trying trying to phase out ordering from Blue Bunny," Griffin said.

Courtney Perna, sophomore in public relations, said she goes to Chillie Willie's often because she likes the ice cream, although she has never been to the dairy bar.

She said she likes the two-for-one special Chillie Willie's offers 2-5 p.m. weekdays.

"I'm really boring though," Perna said. "I always just eat chocolate. They used to call me the ice cream girl in high school because I ate it so much."

WEBMAIL | Users want more deadline reminders

In her first year at K-State, Tapanes said she was not aware she was required to change her password soon after the beginning of the semester and did not remember receiving the e-mail from ITAC.

Tapanes said an article in the Collegian or a notice in classes like University Experience would help students remember the deadline.

Brandon Waldrop, sophomore in psychology, said he received an e-mail about the deadline to change his password, but he said he ignored it.

After he could not access his e-mail account, Waldrop said he found the link to change his password and made the changes necessary.

"It only takes a few minutes, so it's not a big problem," he said.

Gould said most students change their password when they receive the e-mail, but complications seemed to arrive when the e-mail reminders were late.

"This has been an unusual semester," she said. "There are a lot of things changing, but we will improve our communication with students about the change of password."

FALL TV PREVIEW

SUMMARY

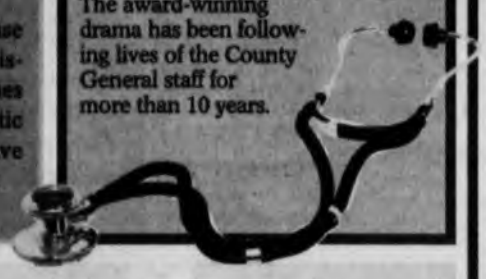
From one "Ugly Betty" to the "Anatomy" of another, shows on this fall's boob tube are likely to reach people of all backgrounds – and the scripts even seem moderately interesting.

Here's a sample of new series to start and some of your returning favorites among the fall TV lineup.

ON THIS WEEK

"SIX DEGREES" 9 P.M. TODAY ON ABC
They say anyone on the planet can be connected to any other person through a chain of six people, which means that no one is a stranger... for long. In this hour-long drama from the producers of "Lost" and "24," six vastly different New Yorkers go about their lives without realizing the effect they have on one another – yet. A web of coincidences gradually will draw these strangers closer, changing their lives forever.

"THE OFFICE" 7:30 P.M. TODAY ON NBC
This comedy mercilessly rips apart and amplifies awkward situations – a co-worker crush, an inappropriate boss – any office worker will recognize.



"GREY'S ANATOMY" 8:30 P.M. TODAY ON ABC

Last season's "cliffhanger" had Meredith, all dolled up for the high school prom, revved up and positioned to choose between McDreamy and the Vet.

"CLOSE TO HOME" 8 P.M. FRIDAY ON CBS
"Close to Home" undergoes a serious renovation. The show cleaned house by killing off Annabeth's husband (Christian Kane) and getting rid of District Attorney Steve Sharpe (John Carroll Lynch). This season, David James Elliott of "JAG" joins as the new defense attorney, so expect some romantic sparks in the workplace. But no amount of retooling will be able to save this show; not all of the many crime/legal dramas on television right now can be successful.

"ER" 9 P.M. TODAY ON NBC
The award-winning drama has been following lives of the County General staff for more than 10 years.

"FRIDAY NIGHT SMACKDOWN" 7 P.M. FRIDAY ON THE CW
You will have to tune in to "Friday Night Smackdown" to get the scoop on the drama and mayhem that will unfold in the ring. But outside the ropes, "Smackdown" is taking some cues from the reality TV craze. The Smackdown league is relaunching the New Talent Initiative to try to draw some undiscovered wrestling stars into the fold. And the WWE Diva Search continues to hunt for the next hot ringside girl. Tune in to see some body slamming and some slamming bodies.

"MY NAME IS EARL" 7 P.M. TODAY ON NBC

"Earl" moves to the most coveted must-see time slot on NBC: the former "Friends" spot at 8 p.m. Thursdays. Packaged together with "The Office" at 8:30 p.m., it's the single strongest hour of comedy this fall. With that vote of confidence from the network and the show's Emmy awards for writing and directing, "Earl" is free to expand his horizons into more involved, deeply hilarious karmic adventures. Last season, Earl won $100,000, got hit by a car, made a list of all the bad things he'd ever done and vowed to right all his wrongs.

"DESPERATE HOUSEWIVES" 8 P.M. SUNDAY ON ABC
Mike is still in a coma, and Susan has a new boyfriend – whose wife is also in a coma. Creator Marc Cherry has promised America's favorite housewives will spend more time together in season three.

"HEROES" 8 P.M. MONDAY ON NBC

"BROTHERS & SISTERS" 9 P.M. SUNDAY ON ABC
Calista Flockhart returns to series television four years after "Ally McBeal." It's a refuge for "Alias" alums, including executive producer Ken Olin and actors Rifkin, Getty and Wettig. The pilot was not widely distributed, and buzz circulated that the project would go down in flames. Can a "Desperate Housewives" lead-in save "Brothers & Sisters?"

"SMALLVILLE" 7 P.M. SEPT. 28 ON THE CW
The rumor mill has James Marsters returning early in season six. Aaron Ashmore has been cast as Jimmy Olsen, a potential love interest for Chloe. Justin Hartley, from the failed Aquaman pilot "Mercy Reef," will play Oliver Queen/Green Arrow for this season. Plus, The All-American Rejects will perform at a party in an early season-six episode.

"GILMORE GIRLS" 7 P.M. TUESDAY ON THE CW
The "Girls" go through a lot of changes. Lorelai and Christopher got together, but will they stay together? Rory engages in a long-distance relationship and will have to make her own life at Yale.

"UGLY BETTY" 7 P.M. SEPT. 28 ON ABC

K-STATE FOOTBALL 11 A.M. SEPT. 23 FOX SPORTS
The Kansas State football team will play their fourth game of the season against the No. 8-ranked Louisville on Saturday at Bill Snyder Family Stadium. The Wildcats have won the last three games of the season under the new reign of head coach Ron Prince.

Networks unveil new shows

The Fall TV season has begun. Networks are competing for the biggest and best shows this season, and while there are many new shows to consider watching, some old ones are back for some new thrills in the upcoming episodes.

EILEEN LAUX

CBS:
Most of the old shows will be back, but many new shows are in the mix. "Jericho" is the story of fictional town Jericho, Kan. "Shark" stars James Woods, a cocky yet charismatic attorney who switches sides to redeem himself after one of his cases weighs on his conscience.

NBC:
"Studio 60 on the Sunset Strip" made its debut Monday. Starring Matthew Perry and Bradley Whitford, it centers on a "Saturday Night Live"-esque show. With the classic Aaron Sorkin ("The West Wing") feel, the show keeps an upbeat energy and gives audiences a look behind the scenes. "ER," "Deal or No Deal" and "My Name is Earl" will all be back as well.

ABC:
"Six Degrees" is based on the theory that anyone is connected to any other person through a chain of six people. "Desperate Housewives" is said to be a lot more like its first season. But let's face it, the real story is that "Grey's Anatomy" will be back tonight.

FOX:
Fox returns with their high-action lineup – "Prison Break," "Justice" and "Vanished." My favorite so far has been "Standoff," the story of high-stress hostage negotiators. The boy-girl partners just happen to be sleeping together. "Til Death" compares what marriage is really like after the "honeymoon is over."

THE CW:
With the merging of The WB and UPN came the birth of The CW. Not too many new shows will be out, which when launching a new network, this is a smart decision. "Runaway" is a brand-new show that will follow a man who was wrongly accused of murder and takes his family on the run. "7th Heaven" will be back even though last year was the final season. "Gilmore Girls," "Smallville" and "Supernatural" will all be back.

This is not every new show that will be out. There are really too many to name. For other shows that may have not made it onto the page, check the official network Web sites. Not every show is concrete, but take a chance and watch a new show. You might just like it.

Beyoncé, "B'Day"
Grade: B
Review by Mark Sibilla

I don't keep up with tabloid news

However, an elementary knowledge of tabloid content can give a better understanding of Beyoncé's second solo album, "B'Day." Apparently, Beyoncé's beau, Jay-Z, has been seen around the town with one of his newest protégés, Rihanna, on his arm. This information isn't essential to the enjoyment of "B'Day," but it does give some perspective for the songs.

"B'Day" (the album was released worldwide on Sept. 4, Beyoncé's birthday) begins benignly with first single, "Déjà Vu." Both Beyoncé's fans and detractors have attacked the song as sounding too much like her song "Crazy in Love." While the accusations aren't completely unfounded, they are a little unfair, but the single is still damn catchy. Plus, who could blame Beyoncé for not deviating from a successful formula?

Beyoncé can be forgiven, because the remainder of "B'Day" finds her taking artistic risks both musically and vocally.

The album follows a fairly straightforward trajectory until second single, "Ring the Alarm," completely changes the direction of "B'Day." The song is one of the most esoteric of Beyoncé's career. Beyoncé is clearly pissed, trading in her usual smooth vocals and sleek beats for a venomous sneer and an unnerving, staccato funk.

Beyoncé adds a new term to the pop lexicon with the song "Freakum Dress." A freakum dress is reserved for "when (lovers) act wrong/that when you put it on/Get 'em uptight." The song, with its start/stop rhythms and bleeping synths provided by Rich Harrison is one of my favorites on the album.

Recommending "B'Day" might cause me to lose points with my friends, but they can pound sand. It is a rare album in pop music that can remain as consistent and affecting as "B'Day" over its run time. By forgoing melodramatic ballads and keeping the tempo high, Beyoncé has created an album full of rage without losing any of her sexiness. It is an album that should keep her name circulating in the media for the remainder of 2006.

Haunting sale

Owner of Pat's Pawn and Gun, Pat Livingston, sold guns to Timothy McVeigh and Terry Nichols, both of whom were involved in the Oklahoma City bombing. McVeigh bought a .45-caliber Glock handgun in 1991, and Nichols bought two in 1995.

An Ogden gun salesman remembers selling guns to Timothy McVeigh

By Josh Rouse
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

At 9:02 a.m. on April 19, 1995, a bomb went off outside the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma City. The after effects of this tragic day will last throughout history as one of the worst terrorist attacks on American soil. There were 168 lives lost that day, 19 of whom were children. 800 were injured by the blast.

Timothy McVeigh was convicted and sentenced to death for the bombing. He was executed by lethal injection at a penitentiary in Terry Haute, Ind., on June 11, 2001. His accomplice, Terry Nichols, was sentenced to 160 consecutive life sentences without parole.

Pat Livingston, owner of Pat's Pawn and Gun in Ogden, Kan., recalls a different side of the story. It was in this small-town gun shop that McVeigh, who detonated the truck full of explosives in Oklahoma City, purchased the .45-caliber Glock handgun that eventually led to his arrest.

"McVeigh actually bought three guns from me," Livingston recalled. "He bought two in 1991, and one in 1993. He was a real clean-cut, nice-acting, polite soldier."

However, Livingston said he remembered McVeigh's co-defendant Terry Nichols a little differently. McVeigh and Nichols were soldiers in the same unit at Fort Riley.

"Nichols was a real sneaky-acting character. He was quite different," Livingston said. "He came in and he bought two guns from me in January and February of 1995, just before the bombing. He was the kind of guy who wouldn't look you in the eye, and my wife thought he was really sneaky-acting. I just didn't like him, I guess.

"They gave no reason to have any feelings that anything was wrong. We ran a background check, and they had nothing on their records. They were approved to purchase their guns and everything, so we had no reason to suspect anything."

Just two days after the bombing, federal agents came to Livingston's shop after tracing McVeigh's gun back to the store. They brought with them a composite drawing of a man who Livingston confirmed to be McVeigh, and the agents left with paperwork that Livingston gave them.

The paperwork, including documents filled out by McVeigh and Nichols, was returned to Livingston. However, the gun that he sold to McVeigh has not been returned.

"I had tried to get the gun back because he wrote me a bad check for the last gun he bought from me – not the one he was carrying," Livingston said. "They took him to jail and they were about ready to turn him loose and they decided to run a gun-check on the Glock pistol."

Livingston also said that he has a message to the terrorists who think that they will be rewarded for killing innocent women and children.

"I think that this idea that they are getting away with this stuff and going to heaven and getting rewarded is a bunch of nonsense," Livingston said.

"What I think is that for these terrorists that killed innocent women and children, there will be a Judgement Day and they could burn in hell forever for what they are doing, because there is no way that you can condone killing innocent people. That's just crazy," he said.

Editor of bilingual newspaper speaks to students

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sometimes the best way to learn another language is by reading a bilingual paper, the editor of a Kansas City-based bilingual newspaper said.

Clara Reyes, editor and publisher of "Dos Mundos," spoke Thursday at the Huck Boyd lecture in Forum Hall. The paper prints stories in Spanish and English.

Reyes said the newspaper is a tool used in classrooms, and can be used to learn both languages.

"You're learning Spanish, that's a very good tool," she said.

"Dos Mundos" began 25 years ago when Reyes saw a need in Kansas City for a bilingual newspaper because of the growing Hispanic population.

Now the newspaper has grown to have business, community events, sports, weather and a kids section, Reyes said.

Reyes has won the National Association of Hispanic Publications lifetime achievement award, as well as the NAHP Latina publisher of the year award in 2005.

Sometimes "Dos Mundos" finds breaking news before the larger newspapers do, she said. She used the newspaper to expose a man in Kansas City who was selling fake immigration papers to unsuspecting Hispanic citizens.

"In some cases the mainstream media covered something after it was covered by 'Dos Mundos,'" she said.

Enrollment slightly down, more diverse

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's fall enrollment numbers were released Thursday, revealing the most diverse student population in the university's history.

Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said the university reported 23,141 enrolled students this fall to the Kansas Board of Regents. This number is down 41 students from fall 2005's enrollment of 23,182.

However, enrollment increased for students of color, specifically Hispanic students which went up by more than 30 students.

"Part of our performance objectives for the Regents for us as an institution was special emphasis on students of color, specifically Hispanic enrollment," Bosco said.

Although the Regents gave K-State the goal of increasing diversity, Bosco said the university specifically chose to focus on the subcategory of Hispanic enrollment.

"We went ahead and picked a sub category to respond to this incredibly growing population within our state," he said.

Enrollment for incoming students also increased for the fall. There are 4,530 new freshmen and transfer students at the Manhattan campus this fall – an increase of 109 students from last year. Bosco said that is a number he could be pleased with.

Salina campus Student Life Center dreams now reality

By Jenni Wilson
K-STATE SALINA ON THE RECORD

SALINA – K-State-Salina broke ground on a new $8 million Student Life Center Thursday afternoon.

The ceremony was part of the school's 40th anniversary.

The center will be a 61,000 square foot building. More than $3 million of the funds for the building are from student fees.

Students and faculty sat under a white tent, straining to listen to the three speakers because of the wind and rain. Gusts reached 39 mph, according to www.weather.com.

The ceremony began at 4 p.m. with Dennis Kuhlman, dean of technology and aviation at K-State-Salina, greeting students and faculty who came to the event.

He said K-State was a place "where dreams finally come true."

After he spoke, Nelson Galle, chair of the Kansas Board of Regents, spoke to the crowd about how the center will not only make transformational history, but will be a place for students.

"It will be a place for students to meet, learn leadership skills, develop physical skills and to promote academic achievement," he said.

Jon Wefald, K-State president, ended the speeches by saying "Go Cats, God bless you."

The ceremony ended with Kuhlman, Galle and Wefald walking to a pile of dirt with purple construction hats and golden shovels and making the first hole for the construction.

K-State President Jon Wefald was present for the groundbreaking of the new Student Life Center at K-State-Salina. The Center cost $8 million to build

The group was invited to join the Salina campus for a campus picnic, along with Willie the Wildcat and the K-State cheerleaders from 5 to 7 p.m. A dance in the aviation maintenance teaching hangar followed at 8:30 p.m.

"It was raining and blowing a bit, but the food was incredible," student body president Lucas Maddy said. "Salina was incredibly hospitable."

Student Senate met between the evening's two events, passing allocations to the Japanese Yosakoi Dance Club and the Apostolic Christian Church Group.

Yosakoi received $222.84 to go to the Greater Kansas City Japan Festival, and the Apostolic Christian Church received $330 to attend a seminar, "Reaching the Lost, Sharing Your Faith", in Peoria, Ill.

The allocation to the church youth group was the only vote of the night that was not unanimous, having only a handful of dissenting votes.

Senate also approved the appointment of several students to university-wide committees.

Adi Angel, senior in pre-professional secondary education, was appointed to the Diversity Program Council. Frank Male, sophomore in physics, and Nick Levendofsky, junior in agricultural communications and journalism, were appointed to the KSDB Advisory Council. Derek Cattoor, senior in agronomy, and Derek Belton, senior in agricultural technology management, were named to the Recreational Services Council.

Legislation for an annual allocation to Bramlage Coliseum of $15,000 was also introduced at the meeting. The money is part of the student privilege fee and is funded for the fiscal years July 1, 2007 to June 30, 2008; July 1, 2008 to June 30, 2009; and July 1, 2009 to June 30, 2010. Senate is expected to make the final allocation at its Sept. 28 meeting.

Maddy said there were barely enough senate members present for a quorum. He said if they hadn't made a quorum, the group wouldn't have been able to vote on anything at the meeting.

"I was disappointed, but it was an hour drive and it was hard for some people to make it," he said.

The end of nothing

U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan retires, finishing a term in which little was accomplished

If any of you like to follow current events as much I do, you'll know what an amazingly busy week it has been in the world. One news item that might have slipped under your radar was the retirement of United Nations Secretary General Kofi Annan.

RYAN SPENCER

You're probably thinking, "Ryan, I thought you're a Republican. Do you even like Kofi?" Of course I do, and as I think back to all the fun times we've had with Kofi, I have to reminisce just a bit.

I remember all the good things he and the U.N. have done for the world, like bringing peace to the war-torn nations of Somalia, Rwanda and Uganda. How can we forget the hardly publicized accounts of blue-helmeted peacekeeping forces selling children for prostitution and raping 12-year-old girls in "saved" African countries like the Congo?

Let's not forget the 14 different sanctions the mighty Kofi signed to politely ask Saddam to lay down his arms and allow inspectors in. Then, of course, there was the gracious help the U.N. gave the U.S. in helping to enforce those sanctions.

The U.N. has long looked after the rights of all the peoples of the world. Why else would it choose the brutal Libyan regime to chair the Human Rights Commission? On the other hand, I'm sure Kofi just didn't have time to get around to punishing his troops after they allowed Serbs to slaughter 8,000 Muslim men and boys in the "safe haven" of Srebrenica.

Plus, the U.N. also cares about the human rights of those in Israel and Lebanon. We all remember the powerful Resolution 1559 demanding Lebanon get rid of Hezbollah, which it quickly accomplished, as shown by the lack of war there in the past year.

Then there was the time during the "skirmish" between the two, not one month ago, when U.N. peacekeepers decided it would be a good idea to stay at their observation post on the border. Understandably, when one of Israel's rockets hit said post, it was an accident.

The world has to be pleased with all the pressure Kofi has put on brutal dictators and war lords like Kim Jung-Il and Mahmoud Ahmadinejad (who recently was welcomed with open arms to give a wonderful speech in which he had nothing but great things to say about the Western world and Christianity).

If things get really bad, I'm sure we can count on some talk of diplomacy needed, and maybe even – gasp! – a resolution. That'll show that mean old dictator.

But most of all, I'll miss Kofi's wildly successful oil-for-food program and the way his own son received checks from an oil company he hadn't worked for since 1998 was amazing.

But the best part of all washow Saddam Hussein used stolen oil-for-food dollars to underwrite terrorism and payoff senior U.N. officials from well-known European countries. In fact, by the end of it, every permanent member of the Security Council, save the U.S., was linked to the scandal. Isn't that great?

So, as we say good-bye to the Kofi Annan era, let us look back at his time spent improving the world and smile. For now we recognize that he won't really be missed at all, except maybe by France.

Big-city life not so glamorous

ANNETTE LAWLESS

In my fourth year at K-State, I will admit that the purple has finally soaked into my blood. I get excited at the sight of Willie the Wildcat. Traditions like tailgating and celebrating K-State football, basketball and volleyball actually are marked down in my planner. I have never loved K-State more.

But if you asked me about my love for K-State four years ago, I would have shared a less-than-enthusiastic opinion. Raised in small-town Wellington, Kan., I never was truly motivated about anything in this state. I just kept telling myself that one day I would leave Kansas and surpass all the wheat farming and sunflowers.

At first, my secret to success was through public speaking competitions – debate, forensics and student congress; I was named one of the top 100 student public speakers in the country. Later, I engaged in a few international civic leadership programs. And then I was accepted by out-of-state universities, including two Ivy League colleges.

Through all this, I was determined to leave Kansas and make it big. I was ready to move away. Kansas State University was the last place on my mind.

One bad thing after another occurred, however, and my college options grew slim. I couldn't afford those prestigious East Coast schools. And while I felt mature enough to move to another part of the country, today I am glad I decided not to make that move.

Last year, I started an internship with a civic leadership program in Washington, D.C. It was an exciting time for me, because I was living my big-city dream, and I got a job for which more than 500 people applied.

Though living in Washington was a lot of fun, it wasn't as glamorous as I'd dreamed. Yes, it was an adrenaline rush living in such a powerful city, rubbing elbows with the people who shape our world.

That's all it was, though. A bunch of political glitz and glam that was cold and unfriendly compared to the life I have here.

And when the day was through, I was glad to finish things up, spend time outside of work and share it with the greatest people in my world – family and friends back home. Living in small-town Kansas taught me the value of friendship and sharing time with family. Living in the big city brought that value to light.

Settling here at K-State was perhaps one of the wisest decisions I have made. It introduced me to opportunities and people I never could have encountered in other parts of the country. I am glad I decided to stick with my roots and embrace an environment that is friendly and doesn't emphasize competition. Life at K-State has taught me to appreciate the little things us small-town Kansans might take for granted.

So if you see me at a football game or wearing a K-State shirt, now you know why I am so proud of my home. While I do care about work and competition, my time here has given me a true sense of pride – in my state, in my family and in myself.

Students in all fields need opportunities to meet professionals for networking

When it comes to getting jobs, sometimes the people you know offer a bigger edge for successful employment than what you know.

The A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications sponsored a media day Thursday when professionals from The New York Times visited K-State to give speeches, to critique portfolios and to participate in panels. Also, the Huck Boyd Lecture in Community Media by Clara Reyes from Kansas City, Mo.-based Dos Mundos offered a look into bilingual print media.

The sessions with The New York Times were important for students interested in media. It was an opportunity for students to hear real-world advice from professionals who are K-State graduates.

The Miller School deserves huge accolades for bringing in professionals from The New York Times and allowing students the opportunity to mingle with these professionals and glimpse the real world of journalism. The New York Times also deserves thanks, because it made a generous donation to the Miller School to make Thursday's events possible.

More departments within K-State should strive to bring in professionals to meet with students in all majors.

The more people with whom a student can network, the more likely he or she is to find a job after graduation.

New apparel store comes to Town Center

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Wet Seal, one of the leading junior apparel retail stores in the United States, will be added to Manhattan Town Center in mid-November, said Sara Van Allen, marketing manager for Manhattan Town Center.

The store, which will occupy about 3,700 square feet, is under construction and will be located in the column area just off the food court in the former Sam Goody location, Van Allen said.

"We have a trendy, fresh and new look. We have anything you would see in Vogue or Teen magazine. We have celebrity looks that students can afford," said a Wet Seal store manager, who requested not to be named.

"This will be the third store in Kansas, with the other two being in Kansas City, so this is a step forward for us," Van Allen said.

"Wet Seal is third in the nation for women's accessories, so having one right here will give students more options to shop apparel and accessories," Van Allen said.

Rayonna Thomas, sophomore in apparel and textile design, said she is excited for the opening.

"I think it will bring more variety to the mall," Thomas said. "A lot of the stores sell the same things. This will bring something new."

Customers can expect a wide variety in belts, bags and earrings in all styles, color and sizes, the manager said.

"We have everything from a basic long-sleeved T-shirt and jean look to club wear and work wear," she said.

Not only will Wet Seal provide variety, but also it will offer low prices to college students, the manager said.

"Our price point is one thing that will attract college students," she said.

She said many people think Wet Seal is geared toward a certain age group, but the store sells merchandise for everyone from mothers to pre-teens.

"We have customers from age 12 to 40, and we carry sizes 00 to 13," she said.

Wet Seal is now hiring for all positions, and those interested can apply online through www.monster.com or www.wetseal.com.

Cleaning house

Public editor's notes: Fourum, yelling and questions

LOGAN C. ADAMS

I don't have a big issue to write about this week. Instead I have a few smaller ones that I'll present together. Think of this as a housekeeping column.

THE FOURUM

I get it. Some want more. What's funny is the Collegian is getting fewer Fourum comments than in previous years.

Opinion editor Owen Kennedy told me the most comments for an issue this week were the 30 he received for Monday's issue. That included the calls and e-mails from the entire weekend, and weekdays have even fewer.

To compare, my record for a weekend Fourum when I was Opinion editor in fall 2004 was more than 150 calls, not including e-mails.

Speaking of senseless babble, there are complaints that the editors are cutting comments based on how intelligent they sound. It's not true.

Comments are printed in the order they were received. They are only moved to fit the space on Page 4. This is another way to reduce risk: if we choose which statements run by their content, we'd be held more responsible if a comment caused trouble.

Next!

SAY IT TO MY FACE

A total of about 25 people spoke with me, while a few hundred simply read my sign, grinned and walked away. At least they know how to find me.

Still, I am not satisfied. I want to hear dozens or more at each YATPE session, because these comments guide the editors.

After each session, I take my notes to the daily Collegian meeting where I report my findings to the Collegian editorial board. Every legitimate comment I get from YATPE goes into that report.

The more comments I get, the more I can tell the editors about what they should or shouldn't do.

So when you see me sitting all alone with my silly little sign, please stop on by and talk a bit. I'm all ears.

WHO WANTS SOME ANSWERS?

Five weeks in and I've yet to get my second job rolling. Shame on me.

I wanted to do an extra feature this semester, a column where readers send in any sort of question and I do my best to find answers.

The problem is, I've received only one question, and it will not likely pan out. Surely K-State students, faculty and staff are more curious than this.

What do you want to know? Questions about K-State, about Manhattan, about anything, I'll take them.

Also, I need a name for the feature, or I'll have to dub it myself. If I don't hear anything better than "Clue me in" two weeks from today, that's what it will be. You'll only have yourselves to blame.

That's it for this time, here's hoping next week brings an avalanche of opinions and questions. That, or peace on Earth.

I'm fine either way.

Logan C. Adams is the Collegian's public editor and a senior in print journalism. Please send comments to publiceditor@spub.ksu.edu or catch him in person 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. Monday at the clock north of Holtz Hall.

New York Times editors speak to JMC students

New York Times design editor and K-State alumnus Steve Wolgast talks about the changes to The New York Times' design through the years.

Christopher Hanewinckel
COLLEGIAN

By Kristen Roderick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The New York Times always has been a trendsetter for newspaper publications.

However, it is behind on the convergence of the newspaper and its Web site. But management is working to change that, Susan Edgerly, a managing editor from The New York Times, said Thursday.

Edgerly and Steve Wolgast, design editor at The New York Times, spoke to a group of journalism students and professors about convergence and the design of The New York Times.

Edgerly said converging the newspaper, Web site and The New York Times' other newspaper, the International Herald Tribune, is what will keep it on top.

"Circulation is declining," she said.

Prior to Edgerly's talk on the future of The New York Times, Wolgast described why the design of the newspaper is different from most other papers.

"The daily layout is based on the 'temperature' of the news," Wolgast said, referring to the bigger the news, the more visual the newspaper will be.

The New York Times uses an old-fashioned design to stand out, Wolgast said.

After the speech, editors, students and professors headed to the Ramada Plaza Hotel for hors d'oeuvres and a chance to meet and greet. The New York Times sponsored the reception, serving mini quiches, egg rolls, vegetables and wine.

Wolgast said meeting with students and giving presentations are what The New York Times likes to do. He said the newspaper spent about $3,000 for the trip and the food.

"It's very generous," he said.

The New York Times has a program in its marketing department called the Campus Speakers Bureau.

"It's what The Times does for college students who are interested in it," Wolgast said.

Best sports movie picks, great rentals

Sports movies are numerous. It seems every time you venture to the local movie theater, there is at least one movie playing on the big screen related to sports.

WENDY HAUN

When you can't make it to the movies, choose the next best alternative and rent one. If you wonder which movie to rent, look no further: this column will lend you assistance.

REMEMBER THE TITANS

Scene to watch: Washington's coach Boone wakes the team up at 3 a.m. and takes them to Gettysburg and makes one of the most inspirational speeches I've ever heard.

MIRACLE

The story of the United States Olympic 1980 hockey team, which won the gold medal. What most don't realize is after beating the formidable Soviet Union team, they still had to play Finland before winning the gold.

Scene to watch: The end, when Al Michaels yells, "Do you believe in miracles?" and the team celebrates and cries. It's no surprise because if they didn't win there would be no reason to make a movie – but you cry anyway.

THE SANDLOT

Simply one of the best baseball movies ever made. It is the story of a child who joins a ragtag team for the summer. I recall there also being something in there about Babe Ruth's baseball. One of the funniest baseball movies, not to mention a staple for any child of the '90s.

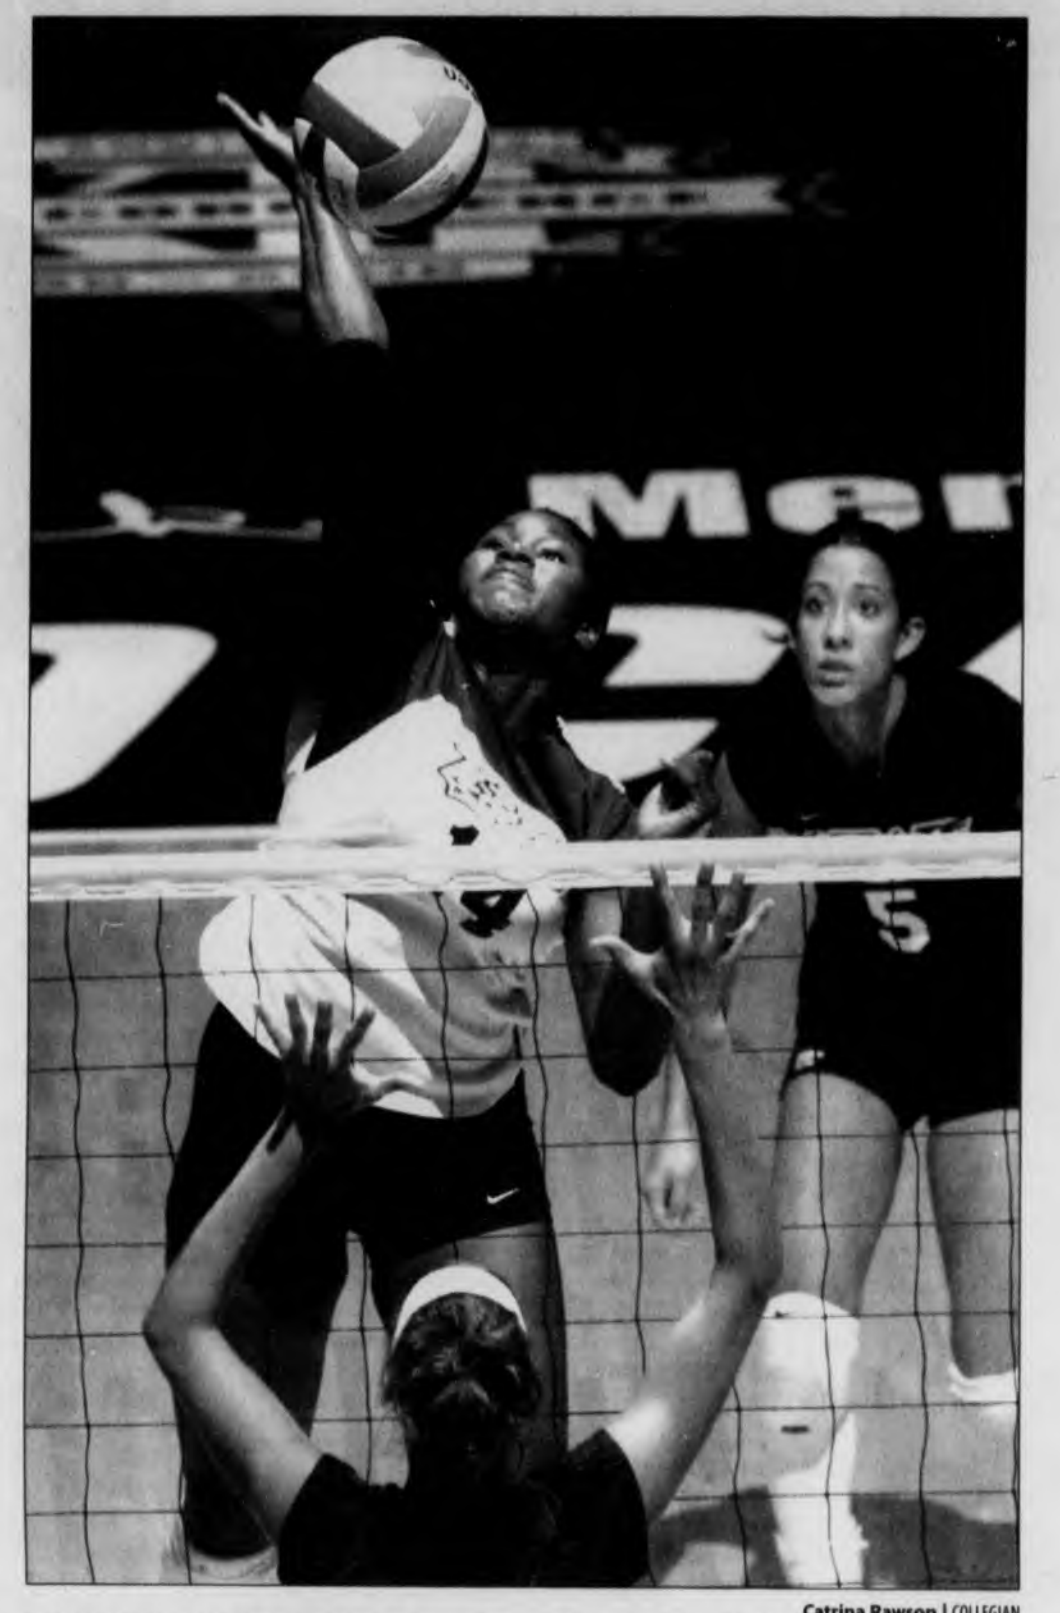
A LEAGUE OF THEIR OWN

Everyone knows the line: "There's no crying in baseball!" This movie showcases four underdog teams consisting of women recruited to play professional baseball during World War II. The women come from different backgrounds and are there for different reasons, but they have one thing in common: they like to play baseball.

Scene to watch: Other than the "no crying in baseball" scene, the scene at the end at the Baseball Hall of Fame is one to catch. A little-known fact: the women who were the "older" versions of the players were the original players in the league.

COOL RUNNINGS



It was based on a true story. I know, a sports movie based on a true story, who would have thought? This is about the Jamaican bobsledding team that went to the 1988 Olympics in Calgary, Alberta, Canada. Three of the four had planned on a trip to the Olympics in running. The fourth is the best friend of the main character, Derice, and is billed in the movie as the "best push-cart driver in Jamaica." With the help of their coach played by John Candy, the team trains for the Olympics. Although they don't succeed their first try, it's a feel-good tale of determination.

Scene to watch: The bar fight when Junior finally decides to stand up to his father and do what he wants to do with his life.

These five movies provide plenty of opportunities to be inspired, laugh out loud and cry unabashedly. Whether you've never watched them or have seen them a thousand times, they are worth the rental fees.

K-State's Tiffany Johnson spikes the ball over a defender Sept. 2 at Ahearn Field House. The Wildcats travel tonight to play Texas A&M at College Station, Texas.

Q&A with redshirt freshman Tiffany Johnson

By Jessi Hernandez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After using last season to learn how to play her position at the Division-I level, redshirt freshman middle blocker Tiffany Johnson is able to show her stuff on the court for the Wildcats this season.

Twelve matches into the season, the Odenton, Md., native ranks third on the team with kills per game (2.83) and points per game (3.54), and second in blocks per game (1.37).

Tonight, Johnson and the Wildcats head to College Station, Texas, to face the Aggies of Texas A&M at 6:30. Both teams are looking to snag their first Big 12 conference win.

Q. You red-shirted last season. How does it feel to be able to get out there and play this season?

A. It feels really good. I'm happy to be able to (do) what I did last year, but to be able to show it on the court, so it feels good to actually be able to play instead of standing on the sidelines.

Q. What do you think are some of the advantages of red-shirting for a season?

A. You get to sit back and watch a lot. You get to learn a lot, and get more feedback. It's not as stressful when you red-shirt, you just get to go into practice and play every day, and you know that next year it's going to be your turn.

Q. What's your major, and what would you like to do after college?

A. My major is journalism and mass communications, and I would like to be a broadcaster, maybe. Something like that.

Q. What was your favorite dessert from the dining halls?

A. (laughs) My favorite dessert would have to be the dirt – the Kansas dirt (cake). It's pretty good.

Q. What are some of your hobbies outside of school and volleyball?

A. I really like to scrapbook – I know that sounds just corny – and beading, making bracelets and stuff like that. I'm a grandma.

Q. What has been your favorite place to travel with the team so far?

A. We had a lot of fun when we went to California last spring, so that was fun.

Cross country to compete in Minn.

By Kristen Roderick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After taking a couple of weeks off from competition, K-State's cross country team will run Saturday at the Roy Griak Invitational in Minneapolis, Minn.

Coach Michael Smith said the race will allow runners to compete against some of the top teams in the country.

"This is championship-caliber competition," he said. "It will raise the level of their competition and let them figure out what top-20-type competition is."

Smith said he is looking forward to see how well the runners perform, especially Liliani Mendez, who won the women's KSU Invite on Sept. 8.

"With someone like Liliani, we want to see how good she is," he said. "We can see if she's an NCAA All-American, or if she's just a good, solid No. 1 runner."

Smith said he wants to see both the men's and the women's teams finish in the top 25. About 30 teams will compete in the race.

"Our expectations are more that we compete to the best of our ability, without worrying about other teams," he said.

The K-State cross country team will travel to compete in the Roy Griak Invitational in Minneapolis, Minn., Saturday.

The course, which is on a golf course with rolling terrain, will also be the location of the NCAA regional meet later this year.

"We're going to test ourselves on the same course we'll run in November," Smith said.

Staff Reports

Where to watch the Wildcats this season

Hibachi Hut Report Card:
Atmosphere: B
Food selection: A
Drink (choices): C
Entertainment: D

Since opening in 1959, Hibachi Hut has seen many generations of K-State students pass through its doors. Perhaps that explains why it is such a hot spot for alumni on game day.

While several bars and restaurants have come and gone in Aggieville, Hibachi Hut, 608 N. 12th St., has stood strong for almost 50 years. But what has allowed it to prosper for so long?

The menu might be a good place to start. Hibachi Hut's menu is filled with items one would be hard-pressed to find in any other Aggieville bar or restaurant. Seven seafood dishes, a large assortment of Cajun cuisine and three varieties of steak are just a few examples. In addition, Hibachi Hut offers a separate children's menu, something few restaurants offer.

The atmosphere is another big attraction. While it is a far cry from a sports bar, Hibachi Hut derives most its charm from its hardly changed atmosphere. Because of this, it reminds many alumni of their undergraduate days. Because it tends to attract an older crowd during game day, Hibachi Hut provides a great family environment.

The drink selection is limited compared to many other Aggieville establishments, but there should be enough variety to suit most customers' needs. Five beers are available on tap, but Hibachi Hut makes up for it by offering several cheap, mixed drinks. It is especially well known for its Hurricanes. In addition, there also is a good selection of bottled beers.

The area where Hibachi Hut struggles most is entertainment. There are only two televisions in the entire establishment, and they aren't very large. There also are many seats where it is difficult, if not impossible, to see the game. Fortunately, they do play the radio broadcast throughout the restaurant, ensuring customers can at least listen to the action.

K-State athletics officials announced today all tickets for the Wildcats' Oct. 14 home football game against Nebraska have been sold.

EQU | Wildcats open season at Georgia's Bulldog Invitational

K-State equestrian's first competition of the season will take place Sept. 23 and 24 as they take on Baylor and host school Georgia in Athens, Georgia for the Bulldog Invitational.

"We have a lot of new riders this weekend and we would like to see how they compete on a new level and see if they can handle the pressure," coach Teresa Slough said.

The double-elimination tournament will feature 19 K-State riders in both English and Western styles. Many new riders will make their debut including six freshmen: Ashley Collett and Kendall Marvin will join the English team, while Laura Browne, Morgan Campbell, Dana Johnson and Josie Kaness will ride with the Western squad.

"This early in the season, this competition will be a great opportunity to see how are team is doing and what things we will need to work on for the future," Slough said.

Chefs create new meals for fraternities and sororities

By Katelynn Hasler
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Cooks at greek houses might have new ideas for healthier meals after two professional chefs cooked a healthy meal Thursday for one fraternity.

The program is designed to provide house members with meals that are healthier than what is often available while keeping costs low, campaign chairman A.J. Scribante said.

The program provides cooks with guidelines and recipes that have been manufactured especially with the needs of fraternities and sororities in mind.

The recipes were created by Maier and Ruggeberg. Both chefs have worked in the United States and around the world.

Their recipes are made primarily with fresh ingredients and save about 50 cents per person based on current national averages, Maier said.

"People often have a real hang up with healthy food, and it doesn't have to be that way," Maier said. "You can have good, solid meals that everyone enjoys. They can help students feel better and perform better."

The chefs cooked meals for Sigma Phi Epsilon Thursday, but they also offered a cooking demonstration for cooks and house mothers from other fraternities and sororities.

Each of the three meals cost less than $1.50 per person to make.

"The food tasted really good," said Thomas Webb, junior in political science and member of Sigma Phi Epsilon. "It definitely seemed like they would have had to spend a lot of money."

Another member of the fraternity said that he enjoyed the food, too.

"It was a nice change," said Jason Miller, junior in business and member of Sigma Phi Epsilon.

"I never would have known it was health food because it was really good. I could get used to this."

If a fraternity or sorority chooses to participate in the program, they are provided with a menu planner, preparation manual, telephone consulting as needed and a two-day demonstration visit per semester at a cost of $5,000 a year.

Christopher Hanewinckel | COLLEGIAN

Chef Michael Ruggeberg of Good Health Cooking prepares dinner for Sigma Phi Epsilon fraternity Thursday evening. Ruggeberg, his wife and Matthew Maier are trying to improve meals in fraternities and other houses.

If the program is a success, everything that it currently offers will become available on the Internet, said Christine Ruggeberg, wife of chef Michael Ruggeberg.

In the future, they will hopefully be able to provide guidelines, recipes, cooking tips and videos of the executive chefs preparing the meals through their Web site, Ruggeberg said.

"This is a win-win situation for everyone," Maier said.

"We are making other cooks more marketable and giving them more skills while providing students with cheaper, more nutritional and great tasting food."

The competition is open to all ages and is free of charge.

At the competition, each band will be given 25 minutes to play a set.

During each band's performance, a panel of judges will score the band on categories like music quality, creativity, stage presence and crowd response. Former judges of OPUS include record store owners and local radio personnel.

The winner of tonight's competition will receive $400, followed by second place winning $300 and third place taking $200. The band Epiphany won last year's competition.

The nine bands performing at tonight were selected by a student panel after local groups submitted their demos to the Union Program Council.

Despite the success of OPUS in recent years, UPC plans to make improvements to this year's competition.

"We want to make the show look more professional," said Erica Boatman, UPC entertainment committee co-chair. "We plan on having a bigger stage, a back drop, and we also plan on having a big-screen out on the plaza to show videos during the 15-minute breaks between bands."

Also at the event, UPC will sell commemorative 20th Annual OPUS T-shirts for $5.

In conjunction with the band competition, students can make tie-dyed T-shirts from 8 to 11 p.m and there will be free nachos.

These are part of UPC's After Hours.

Q. Do you have any traditions or superstitions for game days?
A. I don't have any superstitions, but just like when me and somebody are throwing or warming up I like to stay in the same spot, and everybody goes in a certain order, so just stuff like that.
Q. You're from the Baltimore area. What was it like moving from a big metropolitan area to a small city in Kansas?
A. It took awhile to adapt, but it's not that bad, once you get used to it. And it's great, there's not much traffic around here, so that's amazing.
Q. If you could add one element of a big city to Manhattan, what would it be?
A. That would definitely be more places to go, and a bigger mall.
Q. How are you feeling about traveling to play Texas A&M?
A. I'm pretty excited about it. It's a tough crowd, but I think we'll be able to hold our own.

Citizen's Academy offers insight into law enforcement

Lyndsey Born | COLLEGIAN
Lance Lutman, assistant director of the Riley County Police Department, speaks to attendees about the history of the RCPD during the first class of the Citizen's Police Academy Thursday evening.

By Jonas Hogg
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Tactical units, drug dogs, bomb squads, weapons and dive recovery are all on the agenda for the fall Citizen's Police Academy being offered by the Riley County Police Department.

The first class, held Thursday night, brought 14 people, including five K-State students, with attendees ranging from city employees to curious citizens.

Thursday's class was the premiere for the nine-week course, and was a quick presentation of department history, current capabilities and future projections. Classes will meet every Thursday at 7 p.m. and will run through Nov. 16.

RCPD director Mike Watson said the academy was a good citizen outreach tool, and allows citizens an inside peek into the realities of police work. As an added perk, the program plants seeds of interest in some attendees, which could turn into career opportunities later.

Following Watson's introduction, assistant director Lance Luftman spoke of current capabilities and issues; such as logistics during K-State football and summer's country music jamboree, Country Stampede.

"During Country Stampede the [Tuttle Creek] campground becomes the largest city in Pottawatomie County," Luftman said.

The current RCPD is a result of the 1974 consolidation of the Ogden Police Department, Manhattan Police Department and Riley County Sheriff's Department, and totals 96 sworn officers out of a total of 175 slots, including support staff.

By consolidating departments, something done successfully in only about 20 areas nation-wide, the three agencies were able to combine their effectiveness, their funds and their jurisdictions.

Thankfully, the RCPD did not inherit the sheriff department's 1860's jurisdiction, which stretched from the Blue River to the crest of the Rocky Mountains, and was patrolled by a sheriff and four deputies, Luftman said.

Current and continued growth of Fort Riley and its effect on the surrounding communities was also a topic. While the Manhattan population remains just shy of 50,000, Luftman said department estimates of Manhattan's daytime population hover at 100,000.

Manhattan is not the only thing growing, though. Funds have been allotted to expand the RCPD's jail, which has room in some areas, but has no vacancies in medium- and maximum-security cells. Although the jail was expanded less than a decade ago, the seams are already seeking relief.

"We are living proof that if you build it they will come," he said.

The academy is driven by RCPD's community relations officer, Brian London, who has reduced the class from the original 11 weeks to nine. The sacrificed classes included budget and other classes that were largely condensed into Thursday's introduction. However, other classes have been added to reflect changes in the department.

"As the department changes, this class has to change," he said.

Keeping track of those changes can be important, especially for those hoping for a career in law.

Katie Van Hoecke, sophomore in criminology, said she attended the class to give her knowledge that could be useful if she pursues a career in law enforcement, or possibly law school.

"I know with criminology I'll be doing work with the government," she said.

Whatever knowledge or attitudes people take away from the class, London said the goal is to further educate people on what police do and provide an opportunity for students to become familiar with those behind the badge.

"We want people to know us and understand us," he said. "As society gets rougher, the police get kinder and friendlier."

Speech about equality offers new viewpoints to attendees

By Josh Rouse
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's a new millennium with vast opportunities, and things are changing, said Calvin Williford, chief of staff at the chief prosecutor's office in Jackson County, Mo.

People of different race and sexuality are now more widely accepted, said Williford, also director of public affairs, during a speech at Manhattan Public Library Thursday.

"I'm gay, that's who I am," he said. "It wasn't about getting drunk and sleeping with a man."

Williford, a Dartmouth graduate born in Berkely, Calif., told his life story. He said he changed from a "straight, black Republican" to a "gay Democrat." He later joined the Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual and Transgender Coalition.

Williford, who said he came from a religious background, was offered the opportunity to travel with Ronald Reagan during Reagan's run for presidency. It was during these years that he began drinking, which he said later led to his first homosexual experience.

"What I discovered about myself was my loss of inhibitions," Williford said. "I had never even cussed until I started drinking."

In 1982, Williford was invited to travel to South Africa. It was there that he had his first encounter with racism, when he saw a young black girl lying in bed, dying of polio. He said while the white people in South Africa had all been vaccinated, the black people of the country were denied the vaccination.

"Because of this child's race, she was lying in her bed dying," Williford said. "That was the moment I stopped being a black Republican. I got this feeling of 'Who am I?'"

The speech provided a new view point to some listeners. Nicole Rosencutter, freshman in animal science and industry, said everyone can have a part in taking a stand on these issues.

"I believe that sexual orientation is a choice and that gays and straights should have the same rights," Rosencutter said. "Calvin Williford is a wonderfully passionate speaker who makes several valid points. I just wish more people would have come to listen to his tremendous message."

Robert Gellman, graduate student in human ecology, said what he took away from the speech had to do with coalition building within the LGBT community.

"I think that I've always wanted to change people's minds about approving of alternative lifestyles," Gellman said. "Now I'm realizing that it's more important to get equality."

DOS MUNDOS | Speaker helps Hispanic families

After repeatedly going to government officials with evidence of the man's crimes and being told they could do nothing, a television station in Kansas City worked with "Dos Mundos" to expose him.

"I thought it was enlightening on the concerns of Hispanics in Kansas City," Natalie Cloud, freshman in nutritional science, said.

Reyes also works with families to get Hispanic students scholarships and loans.

When students who get scholarships and loans are graduating, the families she helped are grateful and often ask her to attend the graduation, she said.

"I always get invited and that's very rewarding," she said.

ENROLLMENT | Increase in out-of-state students

the state of Kansas going down, we have been able to stabilize our enrollment and increase our market share in Kansas," he said.

This year, there was also a record number of about 540 out-of-state students compared to about 480 students last year.

"We established a recruitment strategy for selected out-of-state markets principally around the Big 12, and we are starting to enjoy the benefits of our hard work building relationships with high school counselors, prospective students and their families," Bosco said.

Student Body President Lucas Maddy said he is impressed with the increased number of out-of-state students.

"It will increase diversity and bring more national attention to K-State," he said. "It will also increase tuition received from out of state."

Sushi Sampler

Columnist unimpressed with sushi bar

MATT SUNDBERG

When I think "fresh sushi," Manhattan certainly is the first place that comes to mind.

Wow. It was hard to keep a straight face while typing that.

Nevertheless, although Manhattan is one of the last places most restaurateurs would consider putting a trendy seafood restaurant, the management at Panda Express decided the city needed a sushi joint.

I went to the Panda Express Sushi Bar in the K-State Student Union expecting to see a long metal table where a Japanese chef with huge knives chopped away at seaweed.

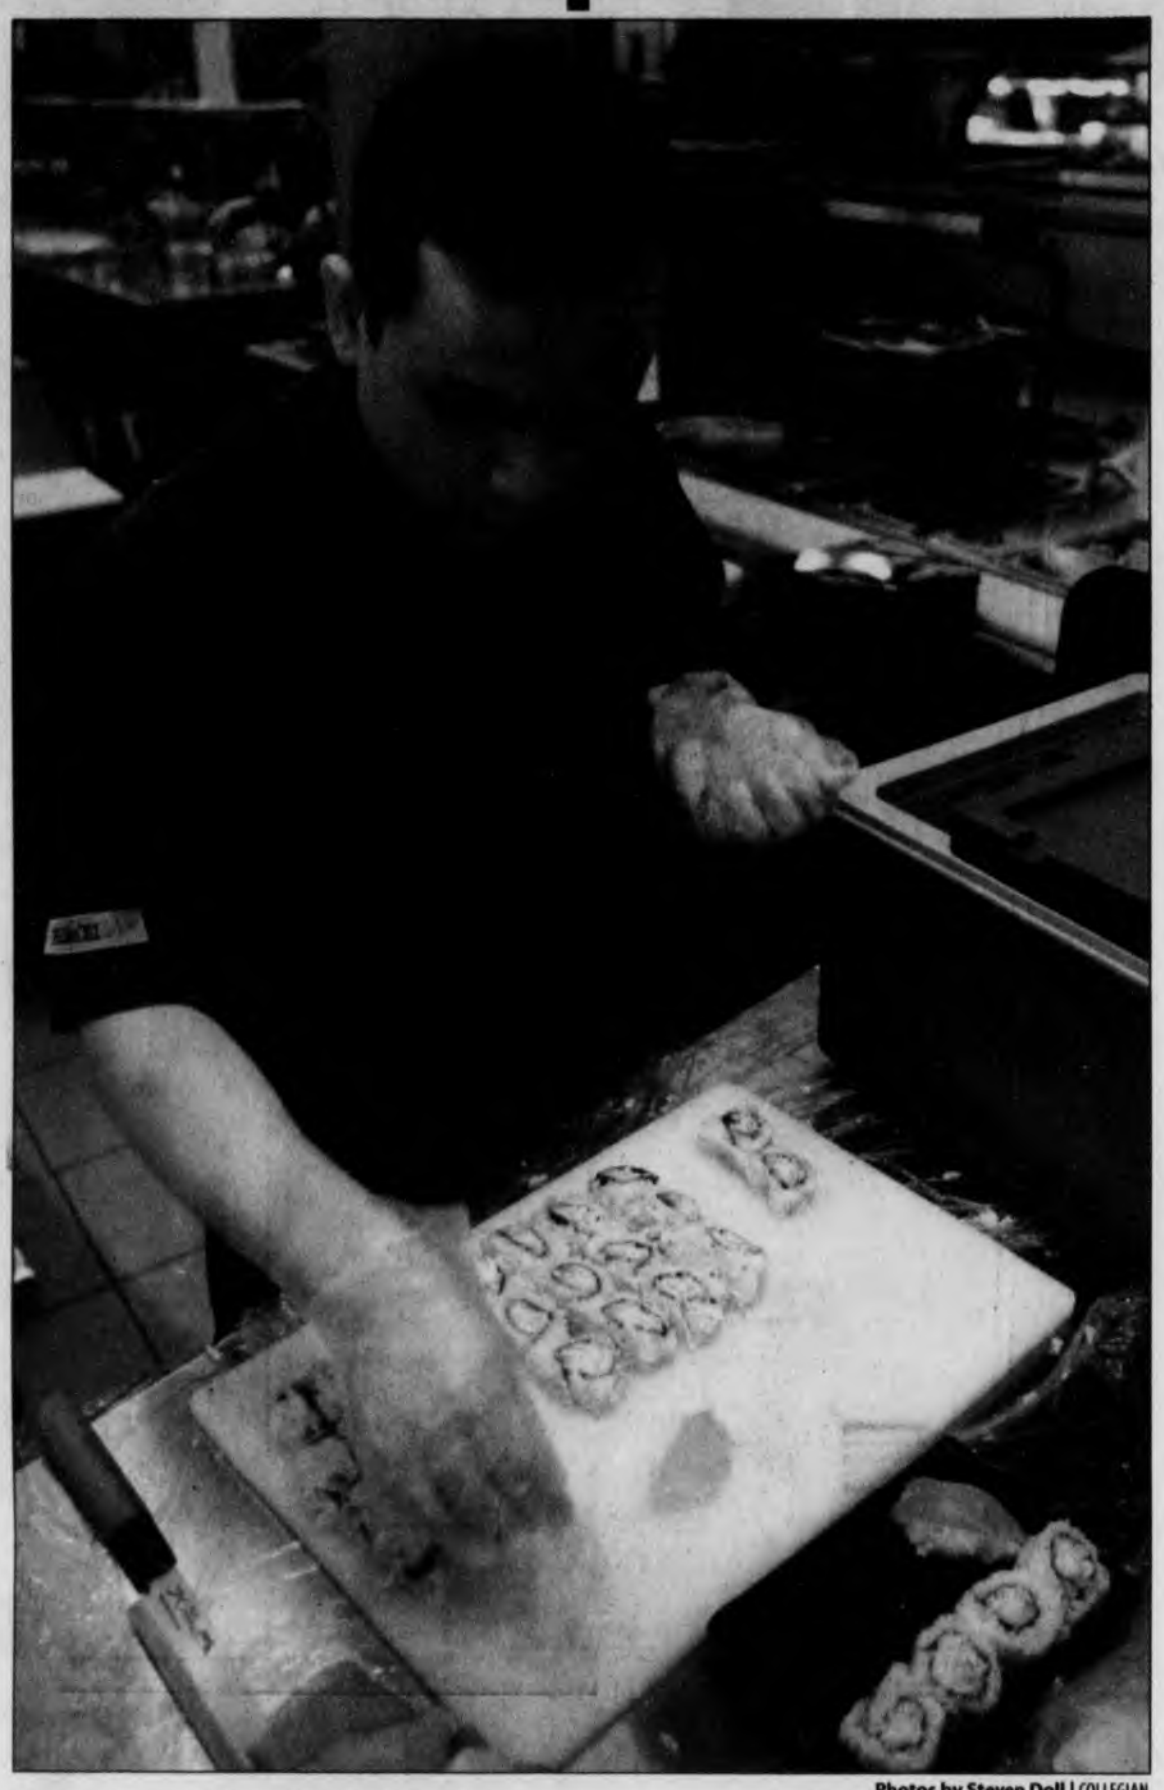
I was disappointed to find there was only a refrigerated display case with packaged six-packs of various types of sushi. I chose the California Roll, which is an Americanized version of sushi made with crab, avocado and cucumbers.

I must admit, it looked pretty with the six sushi arranged around some festive blades of grass.

The sushi rolls were moist – perhaps a bit too moist, as they fell apart in my mouth. There also was too much rice wrapped around the sushi, and the taste of sesame seeds was overpowering.

The crab in the middle of the sushi roll was questionable; it tasted like imitation crab meat. The avocado left an unusual aftertaste in my mouth.

Next to the sushi rolls on the plate was a piece of thin, pink meat that smelled vaguely fishy. My guess would be salmon, except that when I bit into it, it tasted like a jar of pepper.



The only explanation I've come up with is that someone filled a jar to the top with black pepper, poured it all over the phantom pink meat and then left it in a dank cave for several hours. Strange.

Overall, I was not pleased with the quality of the Panda Express Sushi.

Although the sushi wasn't terrible, I was unsure as to the freshness of the crab and avocado. However, the other types of sushi might taste completely different – fresher, less peppery, a touch drier.

Regardless, the rarity of the sushi bar and the lack of seafood options in Manhattan should help the Panda Express Sushi Bar do quite well.

Author's worst-case scenarios entertain readers

Possible Side Effects

Grade: A-

Book review by Alex Peak

Augusten Burroughs' ability to shamelessly bare his soul to the world makes for some funny and touching short stories in his memoir "Possible Side Effects."

As if his first four novels weren't entertaining enough, Burroughs manages to spill more details from his turbulent life onto paper.

In fact, Burroughs has a gift for this. He can take the most mundane, everyday happenings and make them something to read about.

His book includes an assortment of gruesome mishaps most people would be too embarrassed to admit ever having happened to them. In one chapter, Burroughs is at dinner with his better half, Dennis, when part of one of his teeth falls off.

"I looked at the mess in my hand, and there, among the half-chewed square of potato, the sprig of rosemary, the other fresh herbs, was the pearlescent cusp of my rear molar," Burroughs writes.

But he embraces this. It's as if worst-case scenarios are his staple. Why not turn a possibly traumatic situation into something that can amuse readers for hours? By exposing these golden moments in his life, Burroughs makes readers literally laugh out loud or feel his anguish.

Not only are Burroughs' stories funny, but many of them are quite relatable. One possible side effect of reading the book in its entirety is that readers might think they practically know Burroughs. His stories are so personal and honest that you'll want to call him or send him an e-mail, as if he was a close friend.

Burroughs seems to have thoroughly developed his voice in the world of memoirs. Although he seems comparable to David Sedaris on first glance, he seems to have created his own niche.

"Possible Side Effects" was published May 2006. One of Burroughs' earlier novels, "Running with Scissors" – a New York Times Best-Seller – is also a movie scheduled to release in theaters Oct. 27.

The ugly side of love

The Last Kiss

Grade: C-

Movie review by Brendan Praeger

Typically, a film like "The Last Kiss" would consist of young people falling in love, old people remembering why they love each other and Zach Braff ("Garden State," "Scrubs,") despite being whiny and self-absorbed, acting cute, funny and relatable.

Suprisingly, the mushy, all you need is love message isn't present here. In fact, I'm not sure there really is a coherent message. In the end, "The Last Kiss" seems like a depressing sequel to "Love Actually," a sequel where all of the happy couples lie, cheat and break up.

The story follows Michael (Braff), a 29-year-old having a premature mid-life crisis. His life is just how he planned it: a great job, good friends and a beautiful girlfriend. Wow, must be rough.

Unfortunately, he finds all of this to be boring and terrifying. Faced with the possibility of no more surprises in his life, he cheats on his lovely, pregnant girlfriend with a 22-year-old college student.

The script, written by Paul Haggis ("Crash," "Million Dollar Baby,") follows other couples as well. Their stories actually provide more substance and entertainment than the main story. The supporting character's are actually likable, something that's sorely missing in the main story line.

Casey Affleck gives the films best performance as a husband who's miserable after realizing that a baby didn't provide the spark his marriage needed.

The problem with Zach Braff's character is his abrupt transformation from a fun, respectable boyfriend to an unfaithful liar. His girlfriend isn't bestowed with any flaws that justify the heartbreak she feels after discovering her boyfriend's infidelity.

Maybe I'll understand this movie when I'm the guy turning 30, wondering where my life is going. As it is, I'd rather try to hold on the few shreds of romantic optimism I have left.

Off The Field with Marcus Perry

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Marcus Perry is one of the hardest hitters on the K-State football team. In the first game against Illinois State, he made a jarring hit on the Illinois State kick returner that caused a fumble and changed the momentum of the game. Perry has been on special teams for the past two years and has emerged as an important player on special teams and at linebacker this year. Perry, a junior from Leawood, Kan., recently answered questions about topics ranging from his comments on making people bleed to his success in the classroom.

Q. A few weeks ago you were quoted as saying that one of your goals on special teams was to make people bleed. How many people have you actually made bleed?
A. You can take that any way. Making them bleed can mean turning their head and making them shy away from me. It can mean looking a kid in the eyes and going down and hit him, and he backs off or you knock the crap out of him. It may mean making somebody bleed to make sure they know you are hurting them.
Q. Is it hard to balance time between an engineering curriculum and the football schedule?
A. It is a difficult time. It is a very hard major and a very good major, but it takes a lot of time management and a lot of dedication to do both architectural engineering and football.
Q. What was it like being named All-Big 12 Academic?
A. It made me feel very proud of myself. It was a goal of mine, and it proves to myself, my family and my friends that I care about what I do.
Q. Where does the intensity come from?
A. I have had a knack to get fired up to play football since fifth grade. It just comes naturally. It builds up over the week and all comes out on Saturday.
Q. You were the starting quarterback for your high school. Were you ever considered for the third-string quarterback job?
A. No, I don't think coach Prince would want me there.
Q. Do you have any favorite activities off the field?
A. Other than catching up on sleep, I like to either watch ESPN or play Super Mario on GameCube.
Q. You also said you possibly would paint your face for the Nebraska game. What would that add in terms of intensity for the game?
A. I do not think it would scare people away, but it might make people think I am a little more nuts than I actually am.
Q. If there was one person dead or alive who you could line up face-to- face in a tackling drill, who would it be?
A. Right now it would be Tony Temple, a running back from Missouri, just to show him that his old high school quarterback still runs the show.

K-State vs. Louisville

OFFENSE

The Wildcat offense struggled at times against Marshall but still was able to keep the ball moving, converting on 8-of-14 third downs. Dylan Meier had his biggest passing day of the year, throwing for 256 yards and completing 19-of-35 passes. The rushing attack will need to be more consistent to give the K-State defense a break.

Louisville put up 31 points against Miami. The rushing attack was slowed for the first time since losing starting running back Michael Bush. Back-ups Kolby Smith and George Stripling carried 27 times for 87 yards. Hunter Cantwell relieved the injured Brian Brohm, completing 3-of-4 passes and a touchdown.

DEFENSE

The defense continued to make strides in the last week, limiting Marshall to 144 yards. The Wildcat pass rush will need to be on top of its game with Cantwell filling in for the injured Brohm. K-State has not given up an offensive touchdown since week one, but Louisville will be its biggest test. The 31 points the Cardinals scored against Miami was their lowest total of the year.

Louisville held Miami to seven points and 64 rushing yards. The Cardinals have 12 sacks on the season, which could mean a long day for Meier if the Wildcats continue to have protection problems. No team has rushed for 100 yards on the Cardinal defense — Miami gained the most with 64 yards. Temple and Kentucky could not even manage 30 yards on the ground.

SPECIAL TEAMS

Kicker Jeff Snodgrass bounced back from only making 1-of-3 field goals against Florida Atlantic to converting all three of his attempts against Marshall. Snodgrass connected from 22, 24 and 48 yards. The special teams unit continued to excel, blocking its first punt of the year. However, there's still work to be done as it also allowed a punt of its own to be blocked.

Louisville kicker Art Carmody has converted 4-of-5 field goals and has made all 20 of his extra points. Punter Todd Flannery is averaging 42.7 yards per punt and has pinned opponents inside the 20-yard line three times. The Cardinals have yet to return a kick or punt for a touchdown. That streak should keep up as long as K-State's kick coverage remains solid.

PREDICTION

Louisville definitely will be K-State's toughest opponent. The Wildcats faced a legitimate offense last week in Marshall, but they have yet to face a more well-rounded opponent. Expect Louisville to focus on stopping the run and forcing Meier to throw deep. For the Wildcats to have a prayer of beating this team, they will need several big plays from their defense and special teams.

Prince raises the stakes

1st-year coach Ron Prince adds big-name programs to K-State's non-conference schedule

By Nick Dunn
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A game against a high-profile team like Louisville is something fans and players have been waiting on for a long time, and coach Ron Prince already has proven to be aggressive in his scheduling tactics.

Saturday's match-up against Louisville will mark the first game Prince is responsible for scheduling, and it is exactly the kind of big non-conference game that wasn't popular with his predecessor – former coach Bill Snyder.

Snyder was famous for forming some of the easiest non-conference schedules in the nation. That strategy is popular with some coaches, but not with others.

"I like our team. I like this university. I like this area," Prince said. "I like the fact that we get to show it off. (You get) visibility from recruits. It's obviously the kind of game that will attract a lot of attention."

The game is attracting a lot of attention across the country, and it will be nationally televised on Fox Sports Net. The team hopes for a sellout, which would be the first since the 2004 season.

"(A sell-out) would be great," defensive tackle Quintin Echols said. "That's one of the things that, as a player, you kind of try to block the fans out, but when you come out of the tunnel and you see seats full and no standing room, it's one of those things that gets you ready to play even harder. Hopefully we do have a sell-out."

The game against the Cardinals will mark the first time a ranked non-conference opponent has visited Snyder Family Stadium since K-State knocked off then-No. 11 Southern California 27-20 in 2002. The last time the Wildcats faced a Top-10 non-league foe at home was in 1975. In that game, K-State lost a 10-0 decision to then-No. 6 Texas A&M.

"This is what players like," quarterback Dylan Meier said. "I'm sure the coaches prefer quite a few easier games, although we made them harder than they should have been. We don't want to go out and play the last team in Division I-A. This is what players enjoy."

Prince said he scheduled this game in January, soon after he was hired as coach. It would prove to be the first of three big-name opponents Prince would ink deals with for the future.

In 2009 and 2010, K-State will play a home-and-home series with UCLA.

After that, the Wildcats will play a home-and-home series with the University of Miami in 2011 and 2012.

As for which schools took the initiative in scheduling these prime-time match-ups, Prince said he couldn't really remember.

"(Louisville) was a good team, and they were available, so I said that would be great," he said. "They asked if I'd be interested, and I said yes."

After starting the season with a struggle against Division I-AA Illinois State, K-State then cruised to easy victories over Florida Atlantic and Marshall.

Even with such a drastic jump in the strength of the opponent, Echols said the Wildcats will be prepared to face the Cardinals.

"We're ready for a Top-10 opponent," he said. "That's something I'll let you guys judge after the game, but within us, I think we're ready. Coach Prince prepares us so well that I think we'd be ready to play the (Dallas) Cowboys. And I like the Cowboys, so I had to put that in there."

Prince said his thinking behind scheduling tough opponents is so he can prepare his team for the tough conference games that lie ahead, and so he can get an idea of where his team is at right now.

"We're just trying to get our team better," he said. "If you tried to play four of these in the non-conference schedule, that would get tough. But there's a place for this. I like the competition, and we're going to see how good we are."

Ron Prince scheduled the game against Louisville for this Saturday shortly after taking over the K-State program. The Wildcats also signed home-and-home deals to play traditional football powers Miami and UCLA. The last time the Wildcats played a ranked non-conference opponent was in 2002 when K-State defeated No. 11 Southern California 27-20 in Manhattan.

Louisville offense remains nation's best despite losing both Heisman hopefuls

By Jonathan Garten
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Louisville coach Bobby Petrino could not figure out what was wrong. His quarterback and Heisman Trophy candidate, Brian Brohm, was standing outside of the huddle refusing to call a play.

Petrino signaled the call again, but Brohm just threw up his hands. The coach then called time-out and discovered that the junior had dislocated the thumb on his throwing hand. Trainers tried to work the thumb back in place, but Brohm still could not throw a football.

Backup quarterback Hunter Cantwell came off the bench to finish off the Cardinals' 31-7 victory over Miami last Saturday, completing 3-of-4 passes for 113 yards and one touchdown. After the game, Louisville learned Brohm would miss four to six weeks with a strained right thumb.

"Injuries are part of football," Petrino said.

"All you have to do is keep moving forward and make sure the guy behind them has to look at it as an opportunity for them to step up and make plays."

Brohm is the second Heisman candidate for the Cardinals to go down with a serious injury. Senior running back Michael Bush suffered a broken leg in a 59-28 win over Kentucky in week one.

Despite losing their leading passer and rusher from last year, the Cardinals still have the No. 1 offense in the nation. Louisville is averaging 50.7 points per game and 563.7 total yards per game.

Filling in for Bush have been sophomore George Stripling and senior Kolby Smith. They shared carries for four games in 2005 when Bush sprained his left foot.

The two have totaled 401 yards rushing and seven touchdowns. They have combined for nine catches and 176 yards.

"If all a running back can do is carry the ball, then eventually they'll become a liability," coach Ron Prince said. "They're not only runners; they're also receivers."

Cantwell will make his first start of the season on Saturday against K-State. The sophomore made two starts in 2005 – against Connecticut and Virginia Tech in the Gator Bowl – after Brohm tore his anterior cruciate ligament (ACL) against Syracuse.

Cantwell was sacked eight times in the final three games of the 2005 season.

He suffered a broken nose after being sacked four times during the 35-24 loss to Virginia Tech.

"He's very tough, and he certainly showed them how tough he was," Petrino said. "(His teammates) do know that some of those hits were his own fault, so I think that's the thing that we've worked on is to improve the feel of the pass rush and the timing of getting the ball out and the understanding of our protection."

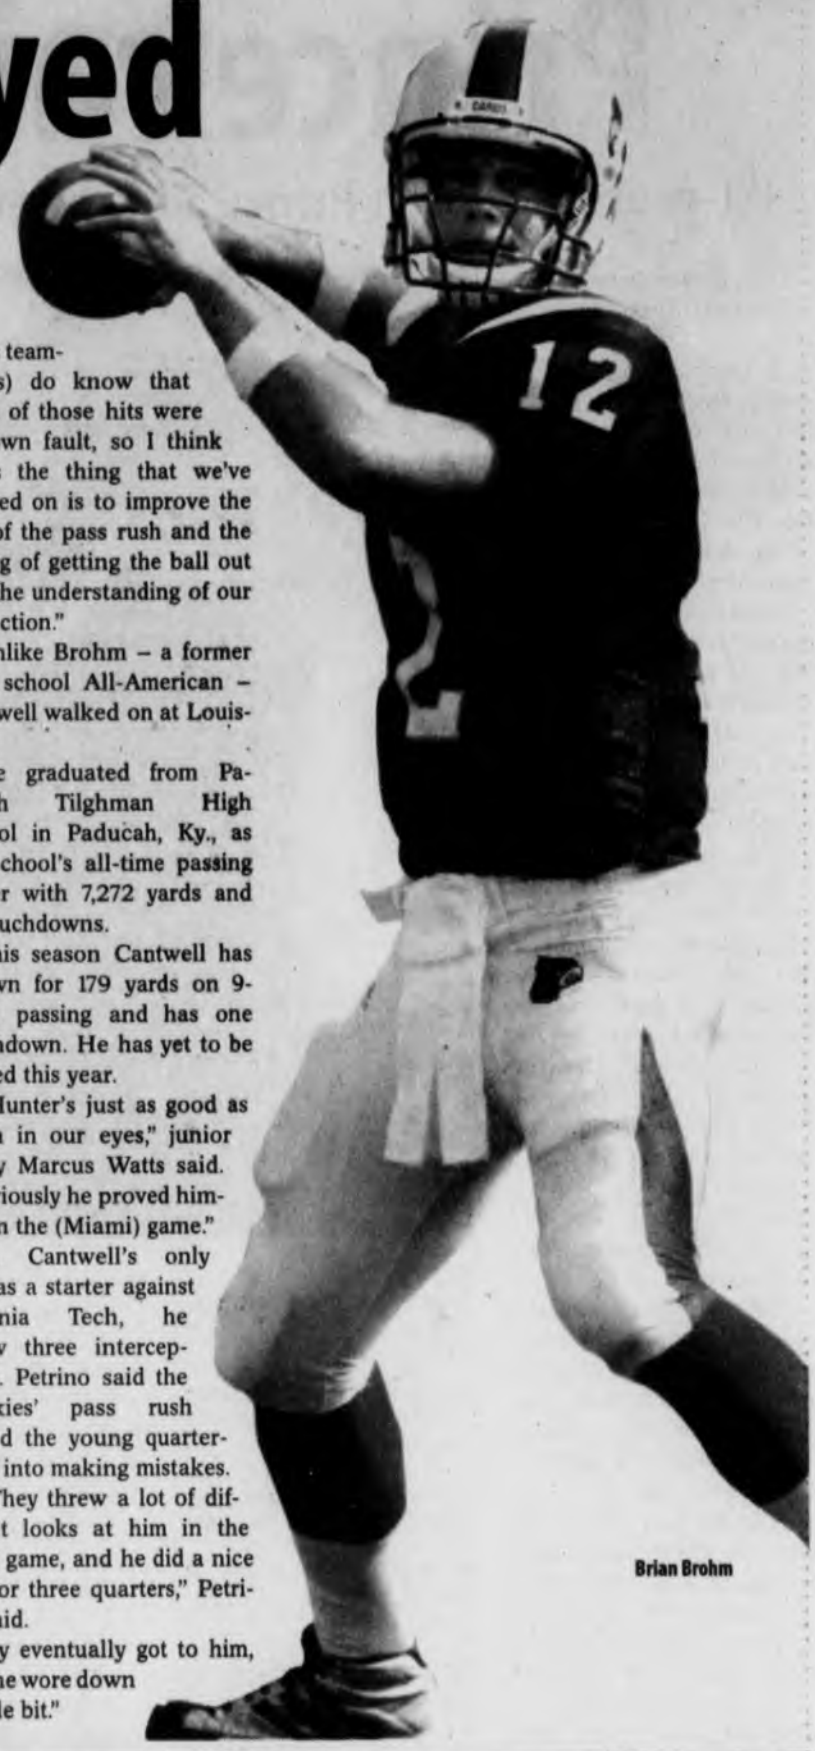
He graduated from Paducah Tilghman High School in Paducah, Ky., as the school's all-time passing leader with 7,272 yards and 70 touchdowns.



This season Cantwell has thrown for 179 yards on 9-of-11 passing and has one touchdown. He has yet to be sacked this year.

"Hunter's just as good as Brian in our eyes," junior safety Marcus Watts said. "Obviously he proved himself in the (Miami) game."

In Cantwell's only loss as a starter against Virginia Tech, he threw three interceptions. Petrino said the Hoakies' pass rush forced the young quarterback into making mistakes.

"They threw a lot of different looks at him in the bowl game, and he did a nice job for three quarters," Petrino said. "They eventually got to him, and he wore down a little bit."

Offensive line improving, but still needs time to gel

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The offensive line usually is not recognized after a win, but when it makes mistakes, it becomes an object of criticism.

Last week, the Wildcats committed 14 penalties for 116 yards, including five false starts by the offensive line.

"We are making a lot of strides since the first game. We still have a lot of little things to work on like mental errors, but if we eliminate those penalties, we would have a lot more success," senior guard Greg Wafford said.

When Ron Prince was brought in as head coach, he brought along a new offense.

"It takes a while to get into a new offense and just be 100 percent confident, but we are getting real close," senior tackle Michael Frieson said.

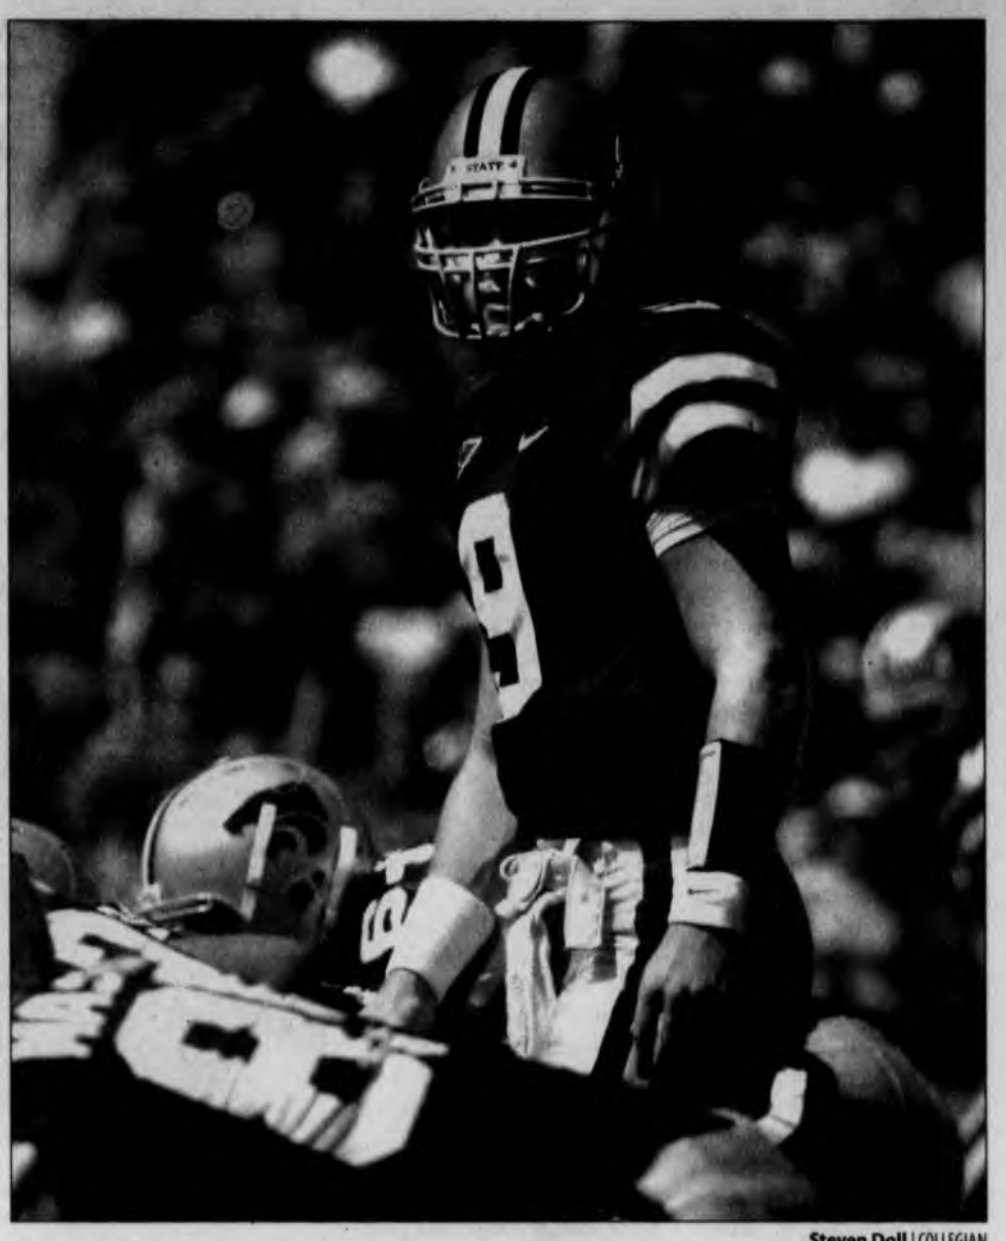
K-State also has broken in two first-year starting tackles. Other members of the line have stepped up to help these players progress.

"They are getting better every day and working tremendously hard to improve on what they think their weaknesses are," senior quarterback Dylan Meier said. "I see them everyday showing the heart and showing that they want to get better."

Meier said seniors Wafford and Frieson have stepped up their play to help younger lineman learn their roles. Prince said Frieson has impressed him with his play this season.

"Although he does not have a lot of snaps to his credit, he has a poise that a veteran offensive lineman demonstrates," Prince said.

Since the spring, Prince has been looking for the right combination of offensive linemen. He said he has promoted competition and will play whoever he thinks is the best player in that position.



"We are expecting some of those other players that may not be household names to continue to improve their game and push for playing time," Prince said. "Everything we are doing is a work in progress."

Prince said he is not afraid to rotate as many as nine players on the offensive line. He also has said he promotes versatility and practices many of the linemen at different positions along the line.

The offensive line is a close unit. Frieson said the linemen need to have strong relationships and work as one unit in order to play well. Wafford said they spend a lot of time together on and off the field. Many of them even live together.

"Where ever we are, we try to stay close and have each others' backs," Wafford said. "We all just stick together and try to work hard together and become that one unit."

Although the offensive line is inexperienced in some areas, both Prince and the players believe they are making improvements. After rushing for only 44 yards in the first game, the Wildcats have rushed for an average of 160 yards in the past two games.

Steven Doll | COLLEGIAN
The offensive line has not given the backfield a lot to work with, allowing 11 tackles for loss this season. It will look to improve its protection against Louisville, the No. 3-rated rushing defense in the nation.

Prince tries 'bold, daring' approach to non-conference scheduling

Ron Prince is not Bill Snyder.

While Prince was on his barnstorming tour – meeting with fans and spouting clichés – Snyder would have been locked in his office breaking down game tapes. Prince prefers his BlackBerry, while Snyder favors hand-written letters. Even Prince's spring game resembled something more like a three-ring circus than Snyder's run-of-the-mill version.

JONATHAN GARTEN

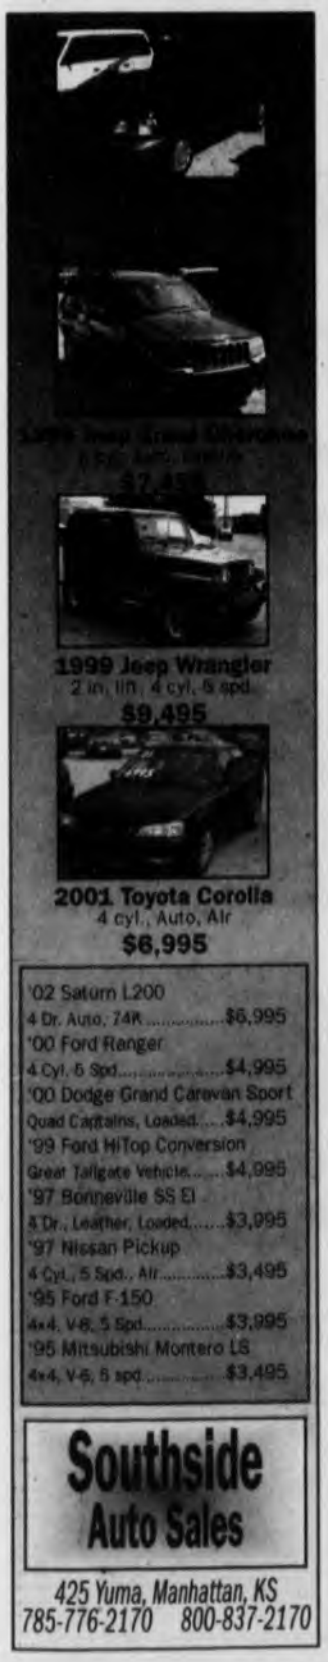
So it should come as no surprise that the new coach has changed the non-conference schedule. In one of his first moves as K-State's coach, Prince scheduled this Saturday's meeting with No. 8 Louisville. Since then, he has announced deals to play UCLA in 2009 and 2010 and Miami in 2011 and 2012. Prince wants his program to be – in his words – "bold and daring."

The strategy is polar opposite to the one Snyder used to build his program. In Snyder's early years, he played one Top-25 non-conference opponent.

But there's no point debating which strategy is better. Under Snyder's plan, scheduling weak teams results in more wins and a better chance at landing a bowl game. Bowl games bring in revenue and attract better players.

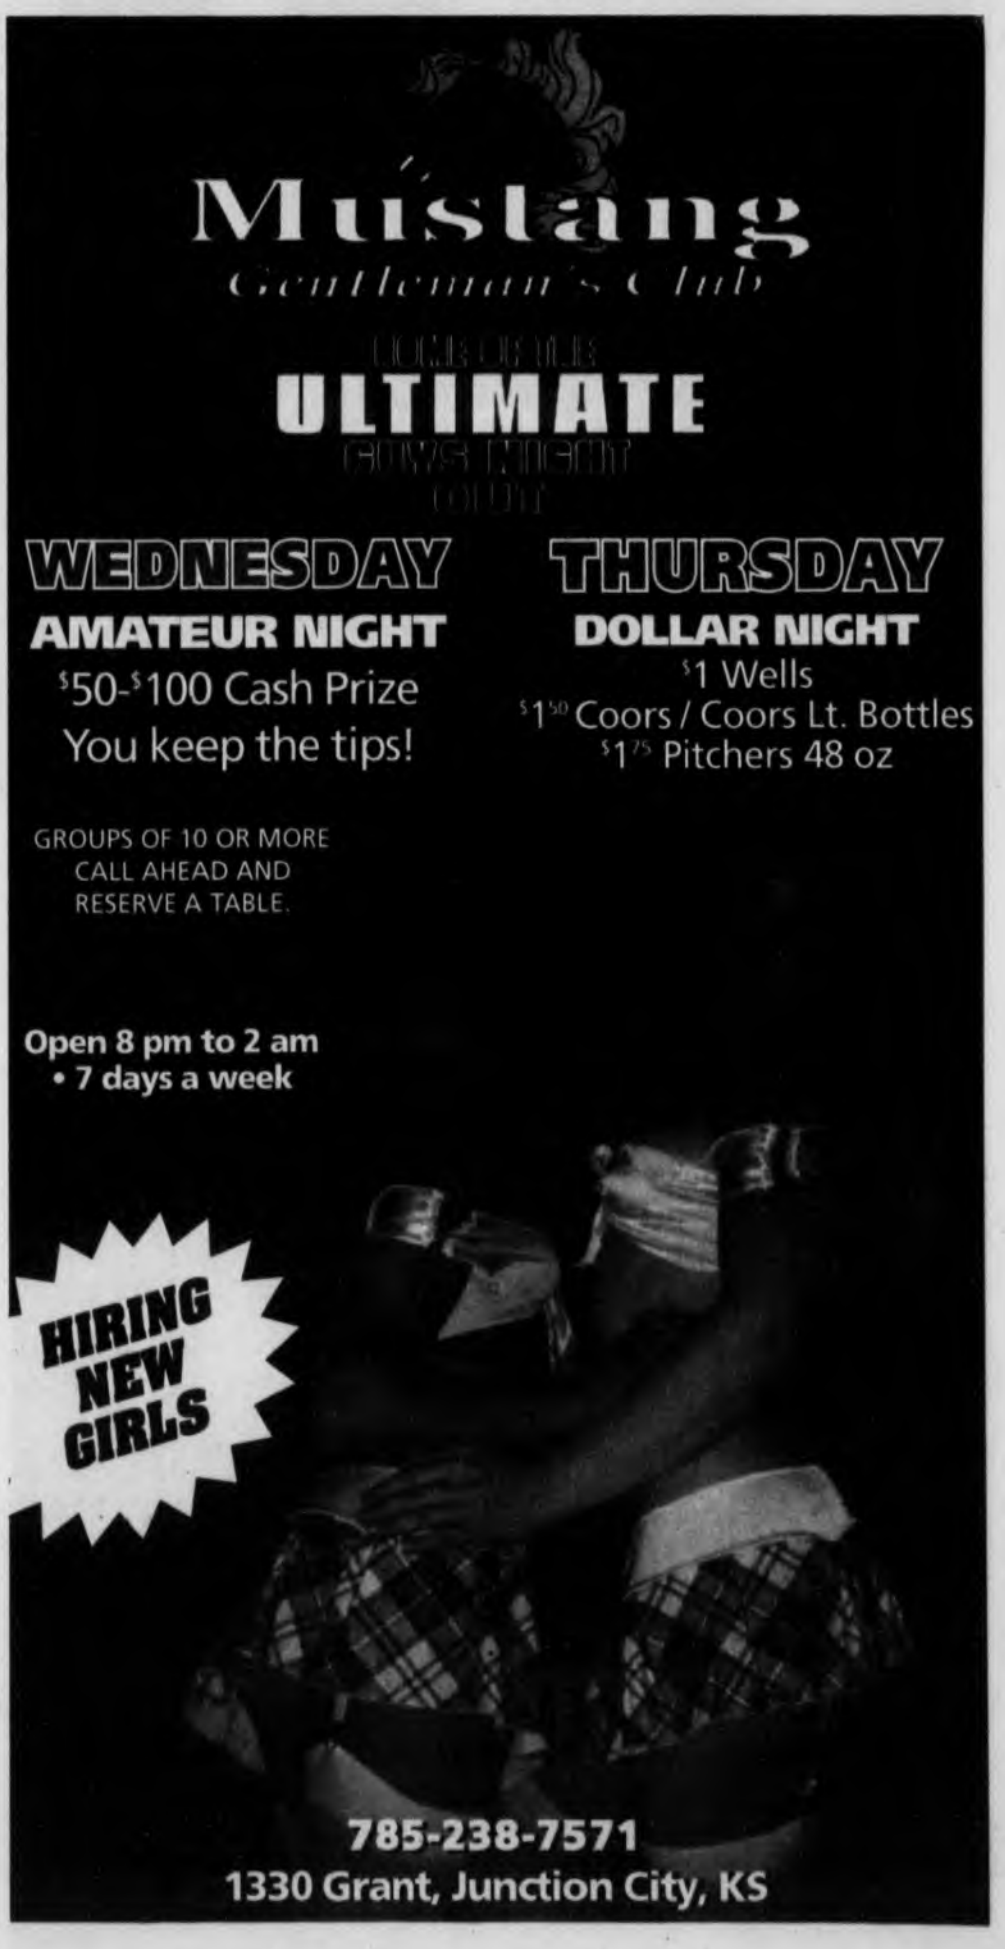
Prince's plan seeks the same results, only quicker. Grab the attention of the top high school players by playing the big games on television. If you lose, then at least recruits will know that playing at K-State means playing in front of millions of viewers. But if you win, then you're a genius. An up-and-comer. The big story on ESPN.

This is why it came as a shock to hear Prince say at Tuesday's press conference that while television people and administrators like the extra revenue a 12th game provides, coaches like himself don't like the idea as much. He contested that he likes the extra competition but not necessarily the extra exposure.



Considering that actions speak louder than words, it would be surprising if anyone in the room believed him.

Prince wants recognition. He wants his stamp on the K-State program. And he wants it now.



If he really did hate it, then he would have scheduled another no-name program like Snyder would have done. He would focus on building the program steadily, playing one game at a time. He certainly wouldn't be worried about who he was going to play in 2012.

But as we know, Ron Prince is not Bill Snyder.

Quintin Echols
DEFENSIVE TACKLE

Echols displays passion, pride

By Jeffrey Rake
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Early on in spring practice, K-State senior defensive tackle Quintin Echols had a difficult time finding his way into the starting lineup, even though he was one of the team's more prominent defensive players just a season earlier.

He was unable to pass coach Ron Prince's strict conditioning test, and that meant he wasn't allowed to take repetitions with the first-teamers in practice.

"I was in the dog house," Echols said.

For Echols, a player who started all 11 games for the Wildcats the previous season under former coach Bill Snyder, passing the conditioning test and regaining his starting job was critical.

After a string of unsuccessful tries, Echols finally passed, which allowed him to take part in full team practices. Prince said Echols has greatly improved his conditioning and work ethic since then.

"We do a couple things that are pretty strenuous and tough in conditioning, and he's been right up there at the very lead of all the linemen," Prince said. "He's gotten my attention in a very positive way."

Echols also has gained the attention of opposing offenses. He has 10 tackles (two for loss) and a forced fumble so far this season.

At 6-foot, 316 pounds, Echols takes up quite a bit of space inside and anchors a defensive line that has played impressively over the last three weeks.

Junior defensive end Rob Jackson said Echols brings a lot more than skill and athleticism to the Wildcats' defense. He brings energy and passion.

"He gets excited over every little thing," Jackson said. "That carries over to the rest of the defense."

If the Wildcats are to slow down a Louisville offense that averages 563 yards and more than 50 points per game, some of that energy is going to have to be evident on Saturday.

Louisville's offense should provide the Wildcats' defense with its toughest challenge to date – possibly all season.

Echols said he welcomes and embraces new challenges, especially from a team like Louisville, because he gets tired of lining up against the same guys everyday in practice.

"When you play against somebody else (an opposing team), it's just a fight," Echols said.

"It's one thing to go against your teammates, but it's different when somebody else comes in and tries to take your territory. I just go out and try to help defend our territory."

Like most of his teammates, Echols takes a lot of pride in his play. He said he always tries to do his best because he knows everybody is watching him.

He said they are his support group and everything he does is for them.

"Right now, I'm not just playing for myself," Echols said. "If my goal is to have a great game, it's not for myself – it's for my wife and kid."

— Jonathan Garten contributed to this story.

The Wildcat defense held Marshall's Ahmad Bradshaw to just 55 yards rushing in K-State's win over the Thundering Herd on Saturday. Even without Heisman Trophy candidate Michael Bush, the Louisville Cardinals have the No. 6-rated rushing offense in the nation.

Louisville's top offense led by coach's recruiting

By Austin Meek
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kentucky coach Rich Brooks described his encounter with the high-flying Louisville Cardinals as "one of your worst nightmares."

The Cardinals thumped Kentucky 59-28 in the season opener, rolling up 631 yards of offense in the process.

So what is Louisville's secret?

Do the Cardinals sneak a 12th man onto the field when the officials aren't looking? Does the quarterback's cadence hypnotize opposing defenders?

Or is Louisville's offense just that good?

No one outside the Louisville huddle knows for sure. Here's what we do know: the Cardinals lead the nation in scoring offense and total offense. They rank No. 6 nationally in rushing offense and No. 7 in passing offense. Missouri (No. 12 rushing, No. 25 passing) is the only other team in the nation ranked in the Top 25 in both categories.

"He is perhaps the best offensive mind in the game of football today, college or pro," Prince said.

Prince said Petrino recruits players to fit his system and builds depth at all positions, a model Prince has followed at K-State.

"He's got a lot of very good players that he has selected," Prince said. "They're well-coached. No matter who is in there, the players play the same."

That depth has allowed Louisville to keep rolling, even without preseason Heisman Trophy candidates Michael Bush and Brian Brohm. Hunter Cantwell stepped in at quarterback against Miami and threw for 113 yards and a touchdown.

Running backs Kolby Smith and George Stripling have combined for 401 rushing yards and seven touchdowns.

Smith and Stripling also pose a threat in the passing game, Prince said.

"They can go out and split away from the formation and run routes as well as a receiver can," Prince said.

Mario Urrutia, a wide receiver standing at 6-foot-6, gives the Cardinals a deep threat in the passing game. Urrutia has two touchdown catches of 50 yards or longer this season.

Urrutia is joined in the receiving corps by Harry Douglas, who leads the Cardinals with 13 receptions, and Patrick Carter, a 6-foot-3 transfer from Georgia Tech.

"Their receivers are pretty big, and they run really well," senior linebacker Maurice Mack said. "The thing that sticks out about them most is that they utilize their team speed, especially getting guys on the edge and getting guys downfield."

Despite Louisville's gaudy numbers, safety Marcus Watts said the K-State defense isn't intimidated.

"We just treat it like another game," Watts said. "We all know they're a good team. We don't let all that stuff get to us."

Pressure, good start key to win

By Austin Meek
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

1. MAINTAIN POSITIVE FIELD POSITION

Given Louisville's high-octane offense, short fields could make for a long day if you're a Wildcat. That means K-State must avoid turnovers, particularly on its own end of the field. On the other side, K-State can't ask its offense to drive 80 yards on every series. Defense and special teams need to put the offense in scoring position.

2. PRESSURE HUNTER CANTWELL

Cantwell's first start of the season comes in a hostile environment with Louisville's national championship aspirations on the line. That's a lot of pressure for the young quarterback from Paducah, Ky. Ian Campbell and Co. need to get in Cantwell's face and force him to make quick decisions. An early turnover could shake Cantwell's confidence and give the Wildcats an edge.

3. START STRONG

The opening minutes of this game will be crucial. The Cardinals have outscored opponents 83-21 in the first half this season, so K-State can't afford a shaky start. If this game is close in the fourth quarter, the edge goes to K-State.

4. KEEP LOUISVILLE UNDER 40

When asked for his defense's magic number, Ron Prince replied, "One less than we score." K-State will be playing without leading receiver Rashaad Norwood and facing the nation's No. 3 rushing defense, so a 41-40 win seems a bit unlikely.

5. HARNESS THE HOME-FIELD ADVANTAGE

The Wildcats need the crowd to be loud, and they need to feed off that energy. A fast start by Louisville, however, could send tailgaters fleeing for the parking lot by the second quarter.

Wildcats to play without leading receiver Norwood

K-State will be without leading receiver Rashaad Norwood, who was suspended for the game by coach Ron Prince. Norwood was arrested about midnight Sunday in the parking lot of the K-State Student Union for disorderly conduct and obstruction of the legal process. True freshman Jeron Mastrud will start in place of Norwood at tight end.

As if the challenge of keeping up with Louisville's high-octane offense wasn't going to be difficult enough, K-State's offense will be forced to deal with an unexpected subtraction from the roster due to an incident earlier this week.

Junior tight end Rashaad Norwood – the Wildcats' leading receiver with 13 receptions for 143 yards – was arrested Sunday in a campus parking lot on charges of obstructing the legal process and disorderly conduct.

Coach Ron Prince said he suspended Norwood for Saturday's game against Louisville after reviewing all the circumstances of the situation.

"I'm disappointed in the circumstances that would lead to such an event, but we have a responsibility," Prince said. "It is a privilege to wear a K-State uniform. We have a lot of positive things occurring around this community, and my expectations are higher than that."

Norwood had showed tremendous improvement in the first three games of the season, becoming a regular target for quarterback Dylan Meier and equaling his total in receptions from a season ago in just the first three games of the season.

"What happened happened," Meier said. "It's unfortunate that it had to come to that circumstance, but it's just time for another person to step up and play. I have full confidence in those guys that are going to be playing. It's their time to rise and shine."

The player Meier might have been speaking of is true freshman tight end Jeron Mastrud. He is listed as the starter on the depth chart, backed up by junior Michael Pooschke.

Mastrud has posted a reception in each of the first three games and has 26 receiving yards this season. He should be counted on to contribute in the West Coast offense – an offense that regularly features short throws to the tight ends.

"We've got talented guys at that position," senior running back Thomas Clayton said. "I'm sure whoever is behind him is going to step up and be just as productive, if not even more."

For Clayton, the situation brings back memories of one he encountered last season when he was suspended because of an incident with a parking lot official on campus. Clayton said he learned from his mistake, and hopefully Norwood will, too.

"They're only human, and we all make mistakes – even myself a year ago," he said. "What it comes down to is just realizing the position we're in."

Prince would not comment on whether the suspension would extend further than this week.

The Wildcats said Norwood's absence will not change the offensive game plan, and they are confident with the depth they have at the tight end position.

As a senior, Meier said he will have to step up and take more of a leadership role on Saturday.

"Individuals make decisions ,and we're not going to be here to babysit anybody," he said. "Everybody's a grown man now. Those things happen, and it's our job to not let them happen again. Ultimately it's that player's responsibility to be accountable for himself."

Prince makes right decision to suspend Norwood after arrest

CEDRIQUE FLEMMING

Hey, K-State football team, congratulations on beating Marshall 23-7 Saturday and remaining undefeated.

At 3-0 on the season, this team actually might have a chance to reach a bowl game for the first time since 2003.

Not only that, but this Saturday the Wildcats have a chance to face and possibly defeat one of the best teams in the country, the No. 8-ranked Louisville Cardinals.

I'm not quite sure how to celebrate, but if I was Rashaad Norwood, I would've celebrated by getting arrested early Sunday morning in the K-State Student Union parking lot on charges of disorderly conduct and obstructing the legal process, according to the Riley County Police Department.

The 6-foot-3 junior tight end is the leading receiver for the Wildcats this year. In three games, he has 13 catches for 143 yards, and before this season, he had a total of only 14 catches.

He finally was becoming the tight end Wildcat fans and coaches knew he could be, and he pulls a stunt like this.

I understand wanting to celebrate a win, but did you have to get arrested in the process?

I don't know all the details about that evening, but if I had the chance to start for a Division-I team, I would not have put myself in a position to get in trouble with the law.

I bet he had just finished watching "Pirates of the Caribbean: Dead Man's Chest" in Forum Hall and was upset with the ending. He was expressing his anger verbally and would not calm down when the police tried to apprehend him.

Whatever the case, this is just another example of what coach Ron Prince is trying to eliminate from his program.

He suspended running back Thomas Clayton for the season opener against Illinois State because of an arrest made last year. Now he suspended Norwood for what will be the biggest game of the year so far.

Prince would not comment on how long Norwood would be suspended, but he should sit out at least a few more games.

These are the kind of players that don't belong on a team trying to change its image.

Most of the players have class, but a few guys still need to learn how to win with pride.

Have fun watching the game from the sidelines, Norwood. I hope whatever you were doing last weekend was worth getting suspended for.

City invokes eminent domain

Third Street businesses prepare for demolition, move, though not all are pleased

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The demolition of the businesses along Third Street will occur in the next few months, after Dial Realty finalizes agreements with business owners, Jason Hilgers, assistant city manager, said.

Some businesses are looking forward to the move, while others oppose being closed down.

Wohler's Used Furniture has signs in its windows accusing the City of Manhattan of eminent domain abuse, as did the owners of Family Dollar Stores Inc.

The owner of Wohler's declined to comment on the seizure of his property but displayed a sign stating that the business was closed due to the "shitty officials of Manhattan."

"They're entitled to their opinions," Hilgers said.

The City of Manhattan issued a memo on Feb. 27 stating Dial Realty had successfully negotiated with 38 of the 40 business owners along Third Street but had yet to make a deal with the remaining two property owners.

The City Commission recommended the approval of resolution No. 030706-C, which declared it necessary to acquire the properties by condemnation, according to the memo.

The businesses that failed to reach an agreement with Dial Realty belonged to Penny Liang Ferlemann and Marlene A. Ferlemann.

The Fox News Channel program Hannity & Colmes featured a special on what it labeled eminent domain abuse, and the Salina Journal blog, Kansas Meadowlark, cited cases in Johnson County and Overland Park of what it also called abuse by cities and counties of the eminent domain law.

The American Heritage College Dictionary defines eminent domain as "the right of a government to appropriate private property for public use, usually with compensation to the owner."

However, some of the Third Street businesses anticipate the new development and

Local ska band wins 20th OPUS contest

The Ruckus beats 8 other bands to claim 1st place in music competition

By Eric Brown
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Leaping onto pianos, a musician swinging his guitar into orbit around his neck, a dancing line of ska-crazed fans, a bass player repeatedly screaming the word "rock" to fill rare silences and free nachos all contribute to the description of Friday night's 20th Annual OPUS Band Competition.

Along with all the activity in Bosco Student Plaza, the band competition, which was sponsored by the Union Program Council, was further complemented by musical talent that, OPUS judges said, surpassed that of the competitions in recent years.

"The quality of bands at this year's OPUS was very impressive, better than any other I've seen in the past," said Sarah Cunnick, part-owner of Sisters of Sound Music, who judged her first OPUS competition in 1995.

In what Cunnick called the toughest OPUS she has ever had to judge, the nine-member local ska band, The Ruckus, emerged as the winner. The Ruckus beat out eight other bands to take home the first-place prize of $400.

"We were pretty ecstatic," said Matt Hubbel, sophomore in music education, of his band's response to its first-place finish.

Hubbel, vocals and trombone for The Ruckus, said he was surprised by the band's victory, especially considering the quality of the other bands at this year's OPUS.

"When we saw some of the other groups at the beginning of the competition, we weren't sure how good our chances were," he said. "It felt great to win this competition."

Hubbel also said the audience at the OPUS competition played a significant role in the band's performance.

"We couldn't have asked for a better crowd response," Hubbel said of the OPUS attendees, who at one point during The Ruckus' set formed a dancing line, weaving through the Bosco Student Plaza. "There's no doubt their enthusiasm made us perform better."

Taking away $300 as the second-place winner was the Kansas City area-based band Silvermen, which provided a fast-paced blend of rockabilly, blues and old-school rock and instrumental solos. The third-place winner was the six-member, local indie-pop band, Shhh. It received $200.

The winners of the competition were chosen by a panel of five judges. The panel included local radio personnel, current and past members of the UPC, a member of the Collegian staff and a local record store owner. Each of the nine bands performing at the OPUS Band Competition were given 25 minutes to play a set. During their performances, the panel of judges rated the bands on stage presence, song writing, creativity, crowd response and musical precision. The winner was announced at 11 p.m. Friday, shortly after the last band's set.

The other bands competing to be OPUS' 20th champion were the pop-punk quartet Star-Crossed Charlie; the folk-blues-jazz-country group Sound Station from Maryville, Kan.; the mellow, power pop-rock trio Of the Flame-Hand Robot; the long-time local rock group The Rest of Us; the piano-driven rock band Dear Arcadia; and the acoustic, pop-rock Mikey Needleman Band.

"There was much more diversity in this year's competition," Cunnick said. "At some of these competitions, you listen to a lot of bands that generally sound the same. That wasn't the case this year."

Tyler Traxson, one of this year's judges and a former co-chair for UPC's entertainment committee and senior in electronic journalism, said he also appreciated the diversity of the bands at OPUS.

"Not only was there a variety of musical styles, the bands also had a wide range of ages," Traxson said. "OPUS usually has just college-aged bands, but this year's competition had groups of diverse ages. It was a good thing to see."

Along with the success of the competition's bands, UPC's After Hours committee provided the event with free nachos and the chance to tie-dye free T-shirts.

"All in all, I was very proud of the event," said Erica Boatman, entertainment co-chair for UPC. "We estimated that our attendance was about 400 to 500 throughout the night, which is great."

Boatman, junior in apparel design, also said the cooperation of the bands enhanced the show's success.

"All of the bands were great about setting up, starting on time and keeping their sets within the time limits," she said. "We're very thankful for that."

The bands that participated in the competition agreed that this year's OPUS was a success.

"The show was very well organized," said Junior Thomason, tenor sax player for the second-place band Silvermen. "The set up was good, and the sound guys knew what they were doing.

"All of the other bands I got to hear were great, too. It was also cool that OPUS had a panel of judges instead of a competition where the best crowd response or loudest applause wins all. We would definitely play OPUS again if the opportunity arises."

TUFTS U. APPLICATIONS TO INCLUDE TEST OF CREATIVITY

"Using an 8.5 x 11-inch sheet of paper, illustrate an ad for a movie, design a house, make an object better, illustrate an ad for an object of your choice."

This unusual task has officially become a criterion for selection to the Tufts University class of 2011, after a new section of the undergraduate application was released Sept. 21.

The optional section is designed to test for creativity, Lee Coffin, dean of undergraduate admissions, said. Answers will be evaluated using the results from extensive research by Robert Sternberg, dean of Arts and Sciences.

In addition to serving as dean, Sternberg is a professor and recognized authority in psychology, whose research focuses on connections between creativity and leadership.

"The essays were strategically written to produce creative, analytical or practical responses that correspond with Dean Sternberg's research on theories of successful intelligence," Coffin said in an e-mail to the Daily.

Sternberg, who was traveling yesterday, could not be reached by press time to comment on his research.

17 STUDENTS REPORT BEDBUGS, BITES IN NYU RESIDENCE HALL

Itchy insect bites on students living in New York University's Brittany Hall have some freshmen worried that their rooms are infested with bedbugs. There have been 17 bedbug reports at the residence hall since the beginning of the semester, university spokesman John Beckman said. Students with uncomfortable bites who reported them to residence hall staff are asked to go to the health center to check whether they've been bitten by an insect.

"We don't want our students to have to deal with bedbugs," Beckman said. "If students are being bitten in their beds at night and suspect bedbugs, we encourage them to let us know."

Tom Ellett, assistant student affairs vice president, sent an e-mail Tuesday to all Brittany residents saying that despite the number of complaints, no bedbugs were found. He said in each case reported, however, a licensed exterminator was contracted to treat the suspected problem. Beds can be tested for bugs with a glueboard used to trap them.

Freshman Mallory Jenkins said she was bitten by bugs in Brittany.

"I scratched the hell out of (them)," she said. "I didn't sleep for three days – I slept with a towel in my roommate's bed."

NORTHWESTERN U. TO REQUIRE PRICEY JOURNALISM TECHNOLOGY

Starting next year, freshmen in Northwestern University's Medill School of Journalism will be required to purchase about $3,600 of new hardware and software to use in class. The new policy also will affect current freshmen.

In June, Medill freshmen received a letter signed by Dean John Lavine, saying they are to buy a laptop with a software package, a digital video camera and a video iPod by the 2007-08 school year. Medill has enacted these requirements to bring students up to pace with the changing technology in the industry, said Michele Bitoun, assistant dean of Undergraduate Studies.

"Many new ways of multimedia and cross-platform storytelling, from audio-video slideshows to podcasts, need all of this equipment," she said. "What they will be able to do (with it) is really exciting."

Some students support the measure.

"Journalists should know how to use this hardware and should be familiar with video editing software, Adobe InDesign and Adobe Photoshop," said Jake Laub, a Medill sophomore. "That is the future of journalism."

10 new species classified as endangered on latest lists

By Jesse Sachdeva
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The U.S. Fish & Wildlife Service unveiled the new candidates for endangered species status in a Sept. 12 news release.

Seven species previously considered for endangered species protection were removed, and 10 new species were added, making a total of 279 species candidates for national protection.

While many might associate the term "endangered species" with rare, elusive animals from remote, tropical locales, several Kansas creatures qualify for the list.

According to the Great Plains Nature Center of Wichita, nearly 30 species of reptiles, amphibians, mammals, birds, fish, invertebrates and plants are considered endangered in Kansas.

The Kansas Department of Wildlife and Parks defines an endangered species as "any species of wildlife whose continued existence as a viable component of the state's wild fauna is determined to be in jeopardy."

Dr. Eva Horne, assistant professor of biology and interim director of the Konza Prairie Biological Station, explained the different levels of protection a particular species can receive through endangered status.

"Animals can be declared endangered on either the national or state level," Horne said. "A nationally protected animal, like the Bald Eagle, is protected throughout the country, while a state endangered animal is only protected in Kansas."

Horne said there are a few endangered species native to the Flint Hills region.

"The American Burying Beetle, for instance, is one endangered species native to the area," she said. "They have been recorded in the past but not seen recently."

Though many species still remain on the endangered list, progress has been made in the way of animal conservation.

The state animal of Kansas, the American Bison, was hunted to the brink of extinction 100 years ago and has since made a staggering comeback. According to a 2002 U.S. Department of Agriculture Census, 232,000 bison currently reside on private ranches in the United States.

Species added to nationwide list

- One plant: Aboriginal Prickyapple, found in Sarasota, Charlotte, and Lee counties, Florida;
- One mammal: New England Cottontail Rabbit, found in parts of Maine, New York, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut and Rhode Island;
- One bird: Red Knot, which migrates along the Atlantic coast;
- Two insects: Florida Leafwing Butterfly and Bartram's Hairstreak Butterfly, both found in Miami-Dade and Monroe counties, Florida;

Lack of intelligence

Criticizing president's smarts not wise for party that teaches politics through celebrities

Illustrations by Elvis Achelpohl | COLLEGIAN

Many liberals criticize G.W. Bush as being stupid. It seems like an unintelligent way to criticize someone, but hey, that's a liberal for you.

Michael Moore is one such liberal. He wastes much time in his fictional movie "Fahrenheit 9/11" on Bush's speaking mistakes and how dumb conservatives look as they get their makeup done before making a television appearance.

As stupid as Bush must be, it is hard to overlook his bachelor's degree from Yale and his master's degree from Harvard. Actually, he graduated from Yale with a higher grade point average than that of liberals' beloved John Kerry.

CHUCK ARMSTRONG

Conservatives must be out of their mind to support someone as stupid as Dubya.

If only they could follow people with true intelligence, people who know everything about foreign and domestic policy.

So many youth today learn their politics from music made by bands like Green Day. While it is great these musicians find ways to express their views through music and words, it is hardly believable that these entertainers have any idea what is going on in the real world.

But wait a second – I bet the members of Green Day all have doctorates from highly accredited colleges. They must, because they speak so passionately about political affairs like they know exactly what is wrong with the country; plus, they have all the solutions.

Hmm. Wait. All three members are high-school dropouts.

Listening to Green Day and adapting my beliefs to conform with their music is the equivalent of going down the street to a dark alley and discussing foreign policy with the local homeless crackhead.

Actually, the crackhead might be more promising. Who knows?

He might have actually graduated from high school.

After studying auto mechanics at a junior college in California, anyone would be able to tackle foreign policy and criticize the president of the United States of America.

And it's not just uneducated entertainers. Anyone with an ounce of brains in their skull seems to be against Dubya. It's easy to see the level of intelligence of these left-wing nuts; just check out the professors standing on the street corner waving signs condemning Bush and his war for oil.

It's sad the president has become the center of jokes for dumb people.

Finally, stupid people across the world can laugh at someone in power and feel they are smarter than he is.

When liberals start attacking Bush for his stupidity, I ask myself how they can be such complete idiots. I feel much better laughing at high-school dropouts than laughing at the president, who graduated from two Ivy League schools.

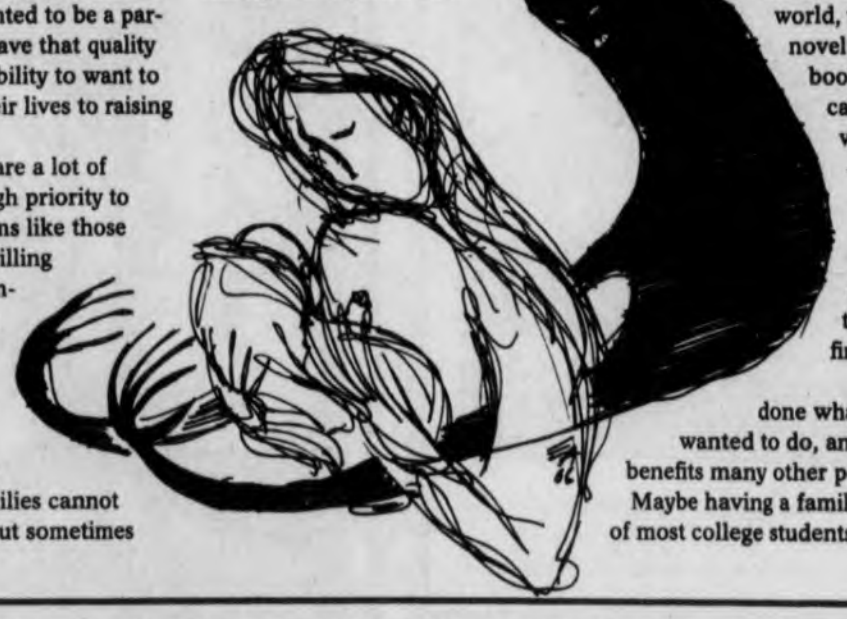
Take time to experience life, world before becoming a parent

It seemed ridiculous at first: the fact that women would be cutting babies out of pregnant women, but it's happened this year – twice. It also happened in Missouri a few years ago. The desire for a baby of their own has driven these women to plot, attack and murder.

KELSEY CHILDRESS

There is much more to life for women and men than to be parents. Not that parenting isn't an important role to fill, but there are other things that can define life other than being a parent.

Like most college students, it is hard to imagine life with a child or two. Having someone who is completely dependent on you is a challenging responsibility.



It is good that so many Americans believe having 2.5 kids and a house with a white picket fence will define their lives, but few people are out there living the "American dream."

Many adults will tell you that all their lives, they wanted to be a parent. Some people have that quality about them – the ability to want to care and devote their lives to raising children.

However, there are a lot of people who give high priority to other things. It seems like those people who were willing to work hard accomplishing something other than having families are the ones who achieve a lot.

This isn't saying that those with families cannot achieve anything, but sometimes it takes people who are willing to dedicate the manpower and hours to come up with something fresh and phenomenal.

It is easy to respect those who take the challenge of raising well-adjusted and smart children. However, those few people who have gone out of the pathway of getting married right out of college and starting a family and instead soared to accomplish their dreams, like traveling the world, writing a novel or giving books to Hurricane Katrina victims – these are the people who have put themselves and their goals first.

They have done what they wanted to do, and usually, it benefits many other people.

Maybe having a family is a goal of most college students. Most of us want to someday have some sort of family. But taking the time before starting that commitment to join the Peace Corps, learn a new language or become a published photographer is what really prepares you to have a great family.

This also prevents the desperation felt by those women who attacked mothers they didn't know. To be so distraught over failed pregnancies that it is easy to justify another family's unhappiness and tragedy is something that should never happen. Even though these women weren't happy, they had no right to destroy others' lives.

Once people are comfortable caring for themselves, then they are ready to begin a life of children and white picket fences.

Alcohol not a necessary component of good times, even during college years

College constitutes a rite of passage when children enter adulthood and declare freedom from their parents.

Along with the start of college, there come opportunities to attend parties and drink alcohol without fear of being judged. Parties and drinking easily can become an everyday occurrence if a student is not careful.

However, it is possible to enjoy your first year of college, even your entire college career, without going overboard.

Students are at K-State primarily for education, not getting drunk. While college offers the chance to try new things and meet new people, students should remember they can do these things without alcohol.

Alcohol is not necessary to make an event or activity more exciting. If anything, alcohol cripples people's personalities. It's entirely possible to go to a party and not drink. It might even be more fun to stay sober and laugh at the antics of the drunk people there.

If you choose to drink at parties, know your limit. You will be happier in the morning when you don't wake up with a headache.

College is about education, starting a new chapter in life and finding yourself. Alcohol inhibits these areas of growth.

No one will argue that college is not fun. Just make sure the fun you are having does not control your life or prevent you from getting a degree.

Profanity at sporting events to be expected; administration should address bigger issues

Editor,

When I read the article "Pep song to be cut if fans don't avoid profanity," I didn't know whether to laugh at the pointessness of such an action or to be angry at the administration for nit-picking at something this unimportant.

The "Hey" song probably is played twice a game, and the lyrics are barely intelligible with thousands of students (some inebriated) shouting them. I'm sorry that Dean Bosco's wife and daughter (whose age is conveniently not mentioned) were subject to the f-bomb, but this is what happens at sporting events.

I've seen my fair share of public sporting events. Profanity, like it or not, is a part of the experience. If a person doesn't like to hear this language, perhaps he or she shouldn't attend a public sporting event, especially one where people have been drinking alcohol for hours before the game.

Watch television at any point during the day, and you'll see the same f-bomb being bleeped out probably 10 times during the average episode of "Next" on MTV. Primetime television isn't exactly the bea-con of "classiness," yet millions of families tune in every night.

If we want to talk about something wrong with K-State sports, let's talk about the fact that our starting running back was suspended for the first game and our tight end was suspended for this one, both for breaking the law.

If a person wants "class," go to an event at McCain Auditorium. Please don't infringe on our good times, and most importantly, our First Amendment rights.

Music albums should be reviewed in context of genre, fan following, not personal taste

Editor,

Mark Sibilla's review of the album "Get Serious" by The Ruckus in the Sept. 19 edition of the Collegian was entirely subjective and did not accurately represent the music it was meant to appraise.

First, the music wasn't reviewed with regard to its own genre. Sibilla comments on the off-beat rhythms and horn hooks as being anti-climactic. If Sibilla doesn't like off-beat music with a horn section, he doesn't like ska. You might as well pan a Ludacris album because the bass makes you dizzy or say El Cazador sucks because you personally don't like spicy food.

For those who packed P.J.'s Saturday night for the CD release, the aspects of the music he dissed were the ones that made people get up and dance.

The article lacked depth in regard to the music reviewed. It's only apparent that Sibilla listened to the first track on the album. He made no mention of the honky-tonk piano on "Sometimes," the slower rock-steady feel of "What Went Wrong" or the instrumental solos on tracks throughout the album.

In short, he handed down his verdict on the album without sufficient evidence.

Finally, the article was less of a review than a statement of Sibilla's own opinion of ska. Only halfway through the copy does he actually mention the album.

The first half is his claim of actually liking Jamaican and English ska even though he doesn't care for the third wave. He dropped a few names and knows the eras, but the "ska trademarks" he turns his nose up at have been the beating heart of ska music since the days of Prince Buster and Derrick Morgan.

Sibilla ends his review by asking the reader, "So what the hell do I know?" About ska music, not much. He's better off telling the world how much he likes Justin Timberlake.

Critics should research more before writing: 'pink meat' is ginger typically served with sushi

Editor,

How can someone so inexperienced in the art of sushi-eating as to mistake the pile of pickled ginger on his sushi plate for meat be able to evaluate the relative quality of the new Panda Express sushi bar?

For one, a California roll almost universally is made with imitation crab. How can a reviewer so uninformed in these things make the judgment that the sushi is "too moist" or that the sesame seeds are "overpowering"?

I think the Collegian owes Panda Express an apology for printing such a negative review of its sushi based only on the observations of someone who doesn't even know how to eat it.

Sarah Lawver
SENIOR IN PHILOSOPHY

Editor,

FYI, that "pink meat" you had with your sushi is not meat at all.

It's ginger, and it's typically pink and served thinly sliced with sushi. Next time, you might want to research things a bit more before writing a newspaper article, so you can avoid sounding culturally insensitive and poorly informed. Most people who have eaten sushi before would know that it's typically is served with ginger.

Producers, suppliers, not consumers, have responsibility to prevent E. coli contamination

Editor,

The E. coli O157:H7 outbreak related to fresh spinach has opened many people's eyes to the potential hazards that exist in the food we eat.

When outbreaks like the one in spinach occur, everyone wants to know how to prevent the next one from hitting them.

Certain problems are not easily preventable in the kitchen. Washing your produce is indeed a smart practice, but pathogenic E. coli can't be washed away.

Preventing E. coli contamination is the responsibility of producers and companies that supply the produce to the supermarkets. Necessary steps need to be in place and closely monitored to prevent contaminated products from entering the market. Food safety starts at the farm and continues through the whole supply chain.

Look for opportunities to assist community

Kansas State University
SGA
Student Governing Association
Letter from the President

When outsiders visit K-State, they always comment that we seem to be one big, happy family.

This is because our campus and our community put forth a superior effort to be involved with one another. That's right – community service. While we all have busy schedules, it is important to be involved in community service on campus and in the community.

The Student Governing Association participates in National Volunteer Week in the spring with a Saturday of Service. This past year, SGA members helped build fish habitats for Tuttle Creek Reservoir.

But you don't have to wait until spring. On campus, ask the clubs and organizations in which you are involved what they do. If they don't do anything, encourage them to. And when you see other organizations that have philanthropies, participate. That's the whole point – a community service project involves everyone.

Look off campus as well. If you don't spot a flyer that catches your eye, take some incentive. Volunteer at the Riley County Humane Society or Sunset Zoological Park, for example.

Manhattan and K-State are only as great as we make them. So get involved and help to create a community that is our true complement.

Breakthrough performer

Raheem Morris — Defensive coordinator

The first-year defensive coordinator's game plan to slow down the No. 1 offense in the nation was successful. The Cardinals came into the game averaging more than 500 yards per game. The defense held them to 401 yards of total offense and their lowest scoring output this season.

Turning point

Second quarter: Dylan Meier throws interception with 22 seconds left.

After converting a 13-yard pass to tight end Jeron Mastrud on fourth down, Meier was intercepted three plays later by defensive back Willam Gay at the Louisville two-yard line. Gay returned the interception 31 yards to the Louisville 33-yard line. The Cardinals then ran out the clock and took a 10-0 lead into halftime, ending K-State's best scoring opportunity of the half.

Stat of the game

Running back Thomas Clayton's touchdown in the fourth quarter ensured the Wildcats would not be shut out. The last time the Wildcats were shut out by a non-conference opponent at home was Sept. 13, 1986 ,when they lost to Northern Iowa, 17-0.

Game MVP

Besides recording a season-high nine tackles, junior safety Marcus Watts also contributed to the game in numerous other ways for K-State. Watts' interception and 68-yard return set the Wildcats up for a potential scoring opportunity. Watts also recovered an onside kick in the fourth quarter, but the Wildats offense failed to convert on its good field position. Watts even displayed quick thinking in the third quarter, knocking the ball out-of-bounds after it was blocked before a Louisville player could pick it up and possibly return it for a touchdown.

To succeed, find game, then play it

AUSTIN MEEK

The K-State defenders repeated the simple phrase like a campaign slogan.

"We're going to play our game," they said.

OK, that's nice, but seriously, how do you guys plan to stop Louisville?

"We're going to play our game."

"We're going to play our game."

It seemed too simple. But here's the funny thing: Saturday, the K-State defense played its game – and it worked.

The K-State defenders did not allow Louisville to impose its will. They played fast and swarmed to the football. They forced turnovers on three consecutive possessions in the second half. Louisville coach Bobby Petrino said they tackled better than any team the Cardinals have faced. Even when Louisville moved the ball, K-State's defense dished out big hits and made the Cardinals work for every yard.

The K-State defenders played their game.

If only the same could be said of K-State's offense. Although, to be fair, it's difficult to say K-State's offensive players didn't play their game, because we really have no idea what their game is. Here are some possibilities:

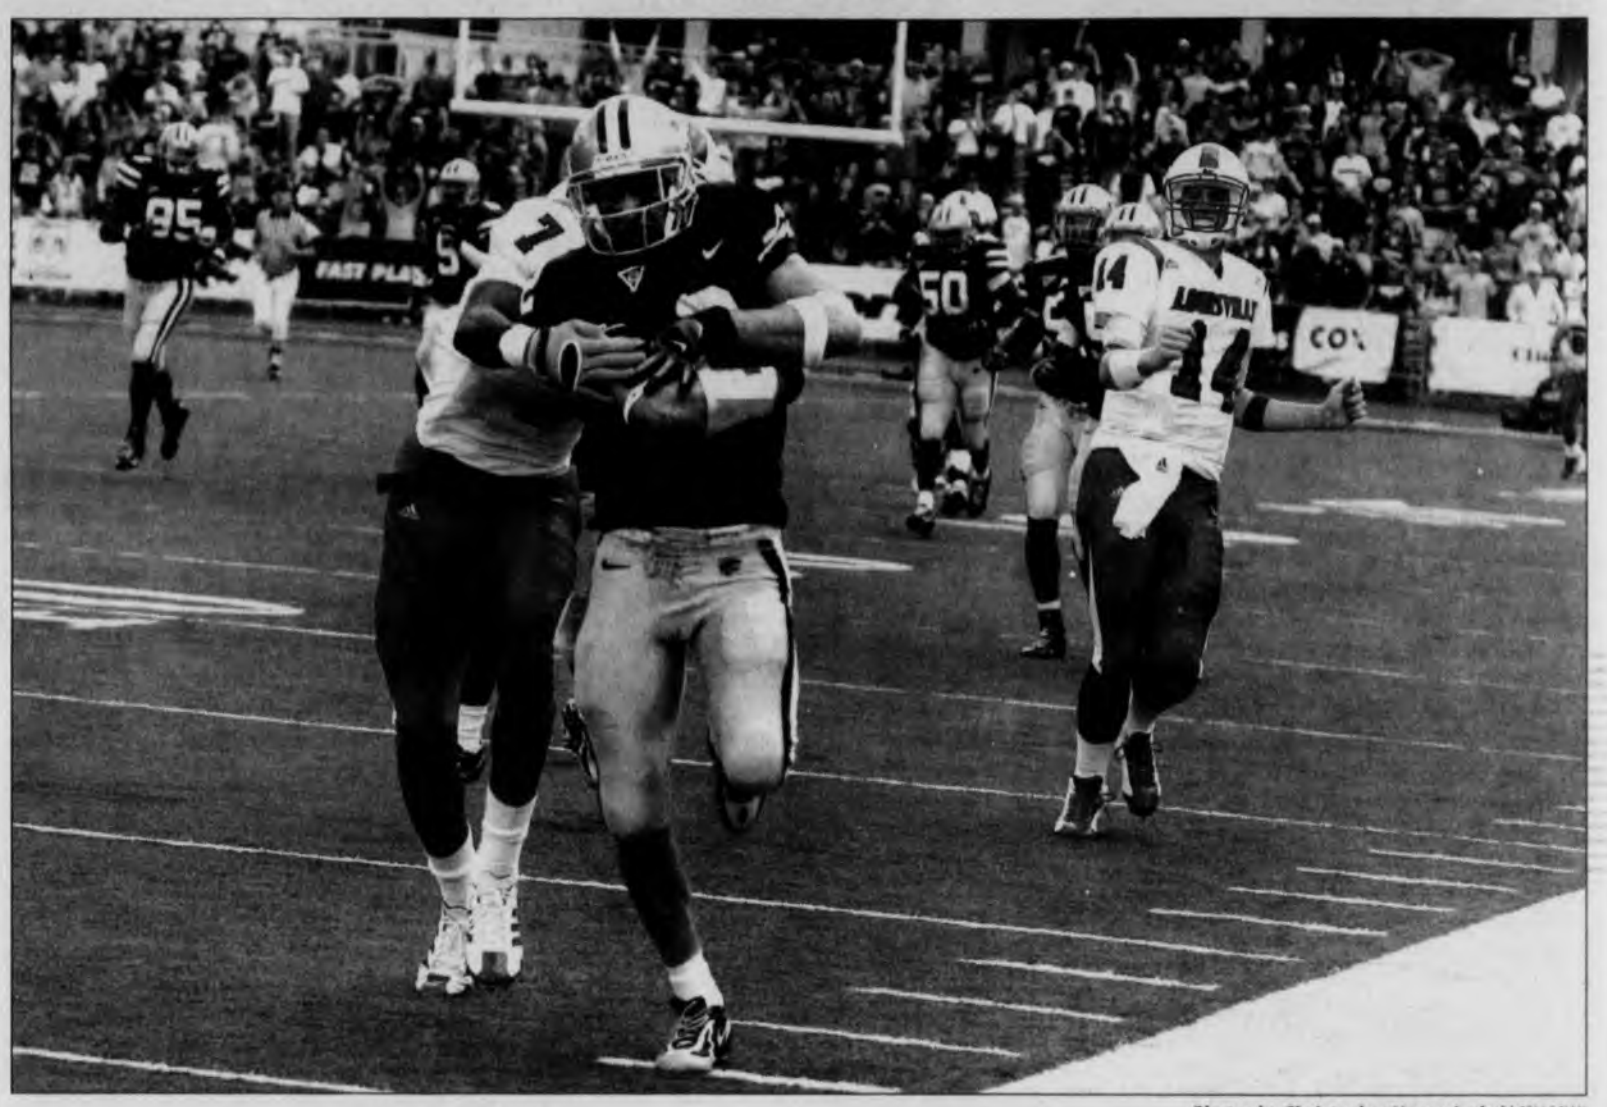
- 1. Losing yards
- 2. Completing passes to the other team
- 3. Monopoly

Late in the first half, K-State attempted a wide receiver pass, better known as "Old Reliable." Cedric Wilson heaving a football 30 yards downfield? What could possibly go wrong?

Of course, Wilson's pass was intercepted and returned 53 yards.

Emboldened by the unequivocal success of the first attempt, K-State tried "Old Reliable" again in the second half. This time, Jordy Nelson's pass was merely underthrown and incomplete.

I'm going to go out on a limb and say K-State's offensive game doesn't involve wide receivers throwing passes. The quarterbacks have enough trouble with that.



I understand Ron Prince's thinking. He thought the only way K-State could win was to walk that fine line between aggression and insanity.

He might have been right.

But here's my point: in big

Inefficient offense squanders defensive effort against No. 8 Louisville on Saturday

Kansas State's Jeron Mastrud is hit by Louisville's Gavin Smart, right, and Nate Harris as he tries to make a catch during the second quarter Saturday. The Wildcat passing was 17-33 for 139 yards, with one interception and no touchdowns.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State defense did its best to slow down the highest-ranked offense in the nation, but in the end, it wasn't enough, as the Wildcats (3-1) stumbled for the first time this season to No. 8 Louisville (4-0) 24-6 Saturday in front of a crowd of 45,855 at Snyder Family Stadium.

The K-State defense – which entered the game ranked No. 14 in the country – held the Cardinals to less than half of their season average for points per game, but the Wildcat offense struggled to put drives together and keep the game within striking distance.

Junior safety Marcus Watts led the charge, totaling nine tackles and an interception in the third quarter that he returned 68 yards to the Louisville 19-yard-line. Watts also recovered an onside kick in the fourth quarter, when K-State was trying to get back in the game.

"Marcus Watts was lights-out," coach Ron Prince said. "It's fun to be around. It's fun to watch him play. He loves football. Some players just have it."

Watts' interception was the third turnover forced by K-State in the third quarter and the second that left the offense in Cardinal territory. However, the Wildcats were unable to put any points on the board after the turnovers.

In the three drives that followed those changes in possession, K-State lost 14 yards in 11 total plays. During that span, quarterback Dylan Meier threw nine straight incompletions, which stopped the clock and forced the defense to immediately return to the field.

Prince's 'daring' plan fails to produce

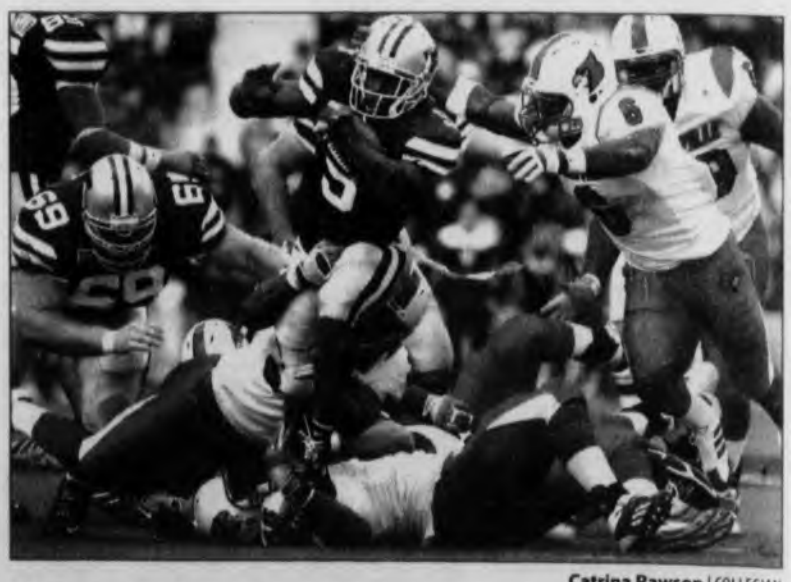
By Jonathan Garten
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Typically, throwing the ball more than twice as many times as you run it will not result in a victory. This theory proved true once again, as K-State lost 24-6 after passing 45 times and running 19 times.

The pass-to-run ratio seemed to be dictated by the Wildcats' game plan to gain an early lead.

"The plan was to be bold and daring and to try to seize an early lead," coach Ron Prince said. "We weren't really trying to play the game just to get it to the fourth quarter. We were trying to win the game."

That plan proved unsuccessful.



Louisville took six minutes and 34 seconds off the clock on its opening drive. The K-State defense had little time to rest, after its offense responded by throwing three straight incompletions.

The Wildcats didn't seem concerned with time of possession. The Cardinals had control of the ball for more than 12 minutes in the first quarter. At the end of the third quarter, Louisville had held the ball for 12 minutes more than K-State.

It was impressive that the Wildcat defense held the nation's No. 1 scoring offense to only 24 points, considering the Cardinal offense was on the field for a large portion of the game.

The only thing that kept the K-State defense fresh was the ability to send the second team in and not experience a drop-off in production. The Wildcats had 19 defensive players register a tackle on defense. Back-up linebacker Maurice Mack came up with one of the defense's biggest plays, forcing and recovering a fumble in the

UFM Teen Mentoring Program pairs college, younger students

By Allison Voris
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Local middle school and high school students were excited for a few hours of miniature golf with their K-State student mentors on Wednesday afternoon.

"Who wouldn't be excited? It's free," one of the participating students said as she visited with the other teenagers before their trip.

The field trip was part of the UFM Teen Mentoring program that pairs K-State students with local youth in need of some extra attention.

"We have created a place where middle school and high school students can have fun, have the support of an adult mentor and also work on their social skills," said Linda Teener, executive director of UFM and creator of the mentor program.

Since 1997, K-State students have volunteered with the UFM Teen Mentoring Program to provide Manhattan teens with a positive and supportive environment.

"Our program provides a place where teenagers who have difficulty with traditional social situations can come and hangout with a positive role model who cares about them," said Maureen Mersmann, senior in family studies and human services and director of the mentoring program.

Weekly sessions are designed to teach students positive life skills and coping strategies. Participating students meet with their mentors to discuss common teen issues like dating, relationships and alcohol awareness, Mersmann said.

Issues are addressed through different one-on-one, small and large group activities.

All the activities are designed to engage the children and let them have fun, Teener said. Mentors have discovered that participating students can be turned off by a school-like atmosphere.

"This is a fun after-school activity for the kids," said Tanya Chengappa, senior in life sciences and teen mentor.

"It's good to have another option besides sports because that doesn't interest all teenagers."

Many of the middle-school and high-school participants were referred to UFM by schools, court services or juvenile intake and assessment. Other students participate because they like the idea of hanging with a college student who cares about them, Mersmann said.

"Our students feel like this is their special place to come," Teener said.

"They can be who they are and say what they want here without feeling uncomfortable."

UFM always is recruiting new teen mentors. K-State students interested in becoming a volunteer mentor can pick up an application at the UFM office or download a copy at www.k-state.edu/ufm.

Within the close quarters college provides – like community bathrooms, small classrooms and close contact with people in residence halls – one thing is almost certain: the presence of airborne illnesses.

Whether it is a winter cold or spring fever, it's bound to affect a few students every year.

Lafene Health Center, is available to see and treat all students when these and other health problems arise.

Lafene staff treat minimal to severe illness; however, as a healthcare center for students, there are restrictions on which health services can be provided.

Carol Kennedy, director of Health Promotion at Lafene, said Lafene offers the same care students receive from local doctors.

If serious emergencies occur, Kennedy said she advises students to visit Mercy Regional Health Center.

Serious injuries like broken bones, severe bleeding, car accident injuries and difficulty breathing cannot be handled at Lafene.

Although Lafene is able to treat some serious illnesses, Brittney James, senior in accounting, said she chooses to use the facility sparingly.

"Lafene is all right for minor things, like if I need a prescription for a migraine," James said, "but if it is a severe sickness, I prefer to seek outside medical assistance."

Lafene is unable to offer assistance to pregnant women and children of students.

"The doctors handling your concerns are general practitioners, and if the sickness goes beyond what they feel they can handle, they will refer you to a specialist," Kennedy said.

Christy Martin, sophomore in business, said outside services can be better in the long run.

"Lafene is convenient, being so close and cheap for students," she said, "but if I really needed to be helped with something, I would rather go to a real doctor just to be sure."

Outside of general health concerns, Lafene does offer a few special services to students.

The health center recently has established an asthmatic clinic where students suffering from previous asthma concerns can be evaluated at no extra charge.

In addition, Lafene offers two sports medicine physicians.

This service extends past athletic-related injuries to include anyone suffering from muscle and bone discomfort.

A women's clinic and a pharmacy also are located in the health center.

Lafene is open to students 8:30 a.m. to 6:30 p.m. Monday through Friday and by appointment.

Specialty hours are 8:30-11 a.m. and 1-4:30 p.m. Monday through Friday.

If a student feels ill or has been injured and does not have an appointment, a health center nurse can be contacted to detail symptoms and schedule an immediate appointment.

Although uncertainty might arise about the severity of a student's health issues, Kennedy said she urges students to contact the center for assistance.

LACK OF SAFEGUARDS CAUSES HIGH-SPEED TRAIN TO CRASH

BERLIN – German officials acknowledged Sunday the test track where a high-speed magnetic train crashed, killing 23 people, was not equipped with the most up-to-date security system, noting such an accident "would never have happened" on tracks where such safeguards were in place.

Traffic Minister Wolfgang Tiefensee said the security plan used by the company that ran the maglev train along a closed stretch of test track in northwest Germany met government code.

THAI MILITARY BANS POLITICAL ACTIVITY

BANGKOK, Thailand – Thailand's new military rulers banned all political gatherings and activities at the local level Sunday, further cementing their powers and pre-empting any opposition following last week's bloodless coup.

The ruling military council, under pressure from critics at home and abroad, also said an interim civilian government might be announced in the next week.

NATO FORCES KILL ABOUT 40 FIGHTERS

KABUL, Afghanistan – NATO forces killed more than 60 suspected insurgents the last several days in an increasingly volatile southern Afghan province while suffering no casualties, the military alliance said Sunday.

Afghanistan's Ministry of Defense said 40 Taliban fighters were killed by NATO airstrikes that "completely destroyed" a militant base in the district of Grishk on Saturday. Maj.

Luke Knittig, a NATO spokesman, said the alliance also estimated about 40 fighters were killed.

ahead of them," Watts said. "Louisville's defense is very good, so that's why we thought that we had to get a defensive or special teams score to give our offense some help. But we're not going to worry about the offense and what they're going to do – we're just going to worry about what we do, and that's play good defense."

Louisville outgained K-State 401-247 for the game, but a more telling statistic was the time for which each team had possession of the ball. The Cardinals controlled the ball for 11 more minutes than the Wildcats.

However, defensive end Ian Campbell – whose two sacks gave him 5 1/2 on the season – said the defense wasn't worn out from the playing time.

"We're a very deep team," Campbell said. "We have a lot of spark going all the time. If you get tired for one play, you come out, get a blow, and the second-team guy comes in. You come back out, and it's all good."

K-State failed to score until the fourth quarter, when running back Thomas Clayton burst up the middle for a 69-yard touchdown run to move the score to 24-6.

Clayton finished with 119 yards on 15 carries, but 107 of those yards came in the final quarter.

After holding the No. 1-ranked offense in the nation to its lowest-scoring output of the season, K-State's defense seems to be right where it wants to be as the team heads into Big 12 Conference play Saturday at Baylor.

"We're a team that plays with great heart and effort," Prince said. "That was a very challenging team – among the nation's best – and we stood right there toe to toe with them for awhile. If you don't play good defense, you're going to lose. We're going to always need to play good defense here, and that's what we're going to do."

OFFENSE | Defense knows its game, but does offense have one?

On Saturday, K-State played like a team with absolutely no confidence in its offensive game plan.

Prince has said the Wildcats need to run the football with power and authority. Against Louisville, K-State rushed just five times in the first half.

Prince has said Dylan Meier is K-State's quarterback. Against Louisville, Meier was benched after three quarters.

This offense needs to know that Prince has enough confidence to stick with the game plan, even if there are a few hiccups along the way.

The Wildcats need to find some kind of identity on offense. They need to find their game and play it.

It works. Ask the defense.

PRINCE | K-State runs take pressure off Freeman

third quarter.

The defense certainly was not aided by a running game. Heading into the fourth quarter, K-State had only 10 running plays.

But Prince was quick to point to the final statistics.

"Thomas Clayton had 15 carries and 119 yards," Prince said. "Not a bad outing."

True, but deceptive. Clayton had 69 of those 119 yards on one carry – a touchdown run in the fourth quarter.

K-State opened up its first nine offensive drives with a pass. With three minutes to go in the third quarter, the Wildcats finally started an offensive series with a run.

However, the real reason for running the ball probably was to take pressure off true freshman quarterback Josh Freeman, who came in after Dylan Meier had nine straight incompletions in the third quarter.

The changing of quarterbacks seemed to ignite the running game in the fourth quarter. The Wildcats had 96 yards on nine carries during the game's final period.

However, the focus on running the ball doesn't make sense when a team is trailing by 24 points in the fourth quarter. With little time left and a big deficit to make up, conserving every second is crucial.

The K-State play-calling seemed backwards. The team came out throwing from the start and then nearly doubled its rushing attempts while trying to play catch-up in the fourth quarter.

Manhattan International Foods is set to move to 2048 Tuttle Creek Blvd., co-owner Lou Heaton said.

"We hope our business will do better," he said.

The new location will put the business closer to Jardine Terrace, and many of the store's customers will remain loyal, Heaton said.

"I think most of our customers will find us," he said.

Many larger businesses along Third Street will move to the corner of McCall Road and Tuttle Creek Boulevard, Hilgers said.

These businesses include Pizza Hut, Long John Silver's Sea Food Shoppe and Wendy's Old Fashioned Hamburgers.

Hilgers said he thought Long John Silver's was set to reopen as another restaurant.

Services let students evaluate alcohol consumption

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A student might not think a few drinks per night constitute an addiction, but at what point does alcohol consumption become a problem?

Free assessments by University Counseling Services let students talk to trained professionals about alcohol consumption.

Bill Arck, director of Alcohol and Other Drugs Education Services, said when students come into Counseling Services, counselors conduct an assessment of the student's situation.

"At least part of that assessment process would be to ask questions about their alcohol consumption," he said. "It's a general screening to see if that is affecting other problems. It's just to get a feel for the global picture of the student."

Counselors present options for students who seem to have a problem with alcohol consumption, Arck said. The options might include conducting further assessments, proposing programs like Alcoholics Anonymous or suggesting a student seek individual counseling.

But Arck said no pre-planned pathway exists for people struggling with drinking problems.

"The key word is it varies," he said.

Arck said students are referred to him by people in the residence halls or Greek Affairs, parents, teachers or themselves.

Over the years, Arck said the number of students seeking help has remained constant. Arck said 12 to 15 percent of students are problematic drinkers, defined as someone who drinks too much or too often.

If students think they might have a problem, Arck said an assessment through AODES is free and confidential.

An alternative, Assessing Behaviors for Change (ABC), is a K-State program for students in the residence halls who have had problems with alcohol. The program, in its third year of existence, is partially funded by the city of Manhattan.

Camilla Jones, residence life coordinator for the Strong Complex and ABC coordinator, said students are sanctioned to the program through their residence hall coordinator or the judicial board after an alleged violation of the residence hall alcohol policies.

"It's been a good response," she said. "Even looking at the statistics from last year, we had less repeat offenders."

Two online assessments are available for students to complete, and they have a chance to meet with a counselor. A wellness inventory is taken to help students make good choices.

"This program looks at more than just the alcohol behavior – really their behavior of how they live their life," Jones said.

Spending time in a communal environment requires students learn how to respect each other, Jones said, and rules and regulations are made to promote respect for others.

Before the program began, Georgette Miller, director of ABC and a doctoral student in counseling and student affairs, said the same students were getting in trouble for alcohol violations and not responding to their sanctions.

"With coming up with this program, students are found to be less likely to get in trouble with alcohol or drugs," she said.

Most of the students who have to be in the program tend to be freshmen who have a perception that college is all about drinking, Miller said.

"When they go through the program, they realize most people don't drink like that," she said. "It helps to correct the misperceptions about college and college drinking."

The program started its first year helping about 60 students. Last year, about 80 students were helped, Miller said.

Miller said she uses the assessments to help students make academic and personal goals.

"Our whole program is about empowering students to make positive changes," Miller said.

Princeton junior writes 8-step program to create healthy college lifestyle

"The Dorm Room Diet"

Grade: B

Book review by Eileen Laux

Every K-State student has to have Gumby's every once in a while. Pizza, fast food, beer and other junk foods generally constitute the average college student's diet. However, eating what you like doesn't have to mean you'll gain 30 pounds in your first couple years of college.

In "The Dorm Room Diet," author and Princeton junior Daphne Oz has created "the eight-step program for creating a healthy lifestyle plan that really works."

Oz, daughter of heart surgeon and author Dr. Mehmet Oz, struggled with her weight during her teenage years and decided to take control of it after entering college (during her freshman year she lost 10 pounds).

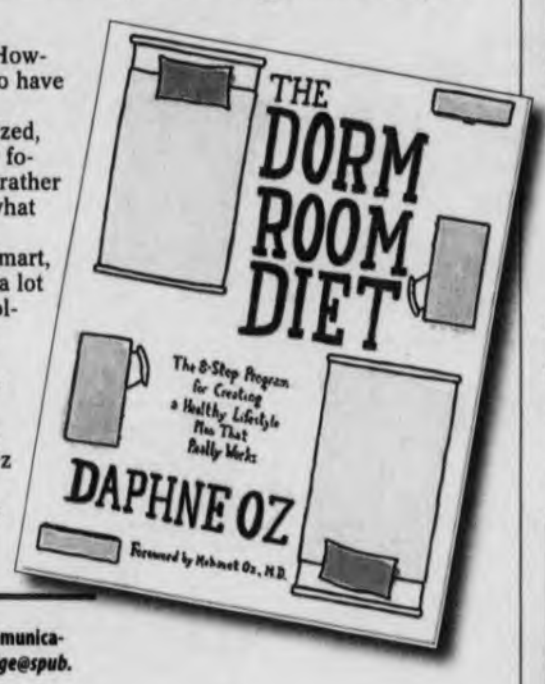
Throughout the book, Oz offers tips on how to choose more nutritious foods.

"Sugar is an acquired taste that you can 'train' yourself not to need," she writes in the book.

She also includes a weight chart for women to use to figure their healthy weight and to calculate the Basal Metabolic Rate (BMR).

The most intriguing section is when Oz condones coffee, chocolate and bread with olive oil.

Drinking four six-ounce cups of coffee is not harmful, a small piece of dark chocolate every once in a while is good for a little pick-me-up, and a small piece of bread before a meal is OK, because it will make one less likely to overeat.



"Sixty percent of Americans are on a diet at any given time," according to the book.

I didn't agree with all sections of the book, but I did get the overall message. This is the time to make healthy lifestyle changes. However, this also is the time to have as much fun as you can.

The book is well-organized, brightly colored and really focused on lifestyle changes rather than depriving people of what they want.

Overall, the book was smart, easy to read and explored a lot of the things that we, as college students, go through.

Being a senior, I see I probably could have made some healthier decisions as a freshman, and I agree with the majority of tips Oz gives, so freshmen definitely should consider this lifestyle when entering college.

Eileen Laux is a senior in mass communications. Please send comments to edge@spub.ksu.edu.

Q&A with Daphne Oz

Q: You wrote for ElleGirl in high school. How did that happen?
A: My cousin was the beauty editor for the magazine, and they were looking for product testers. I submitted my writing, and they gave me a product testing column, testing 73 products on myself and then writing about them. It really helped me hone my writing.

Q: How is "The Dorm Room Diet" different from other diets?
A: This is the first book I've seen that directly focuses on the college population. College students are leaving home for the first time and dealing with situations without the guidance of their parents. They can be influenced by new information and haven't established concrete eating habits yet. This is not a fad diet. This is how you're going to incorporate a healthy lifestyle into your life.

Q: Is the book directed at both genders or more geared toward women?
A: Men face the same issues, so I would say it's applied to both. It's written like it was for a friend of mine, but there are sections just for women.

Q: Where did you get your inspiration for the book?
A: This is an experience that I lived through. I thought I should put it down on paper. Obviously, my dad was a huge influence.

Q: Do you think there should be more focus on the "Freshman 15?"
A: No, there should be more focus on how we can make my generation live a healthy lifestyle so we don't keep reading more headlines on America's expanding waistline.

Q: You say students should avoid drinking too much, because it can be dangerous, but isn't it high in calories as well?
A: There should be no deprivation, because students should experience college fully, but they should have the right information. You could be eating right, but if you are drinking a Thanksgiving feast of calories, then that won't be a healthy lifestyle.

Q: Why eight steps?
A: It was just kind of the magic number; it broke down really well.

Q: You condone chocolate, coffee and bread before meals, which is not something most diets include. Why?
A: This is a plan for life, not a plan for deprivation. You need to know how much you can indulge every once in a while; never be utterly deprived.

Q: Some diets focus on guilt and making sure you don't cheat. Why is that bad?
A: I think that sets you up for feeling like a failure when you cheat a little bit. Diets shouldn't make you feel badly. There is no magic food to remove here. The lifestyle change is made for permanent, great results.

Q: How has your life changed since the success of the book?
A: Not too much, except that people now recognize that I'm the author, but I don't have the degrees in this field. I am more a communicator of information. It is such a wonderful feeling having the potential to be so helpful to other people.

MTV launches new channel to replace MTV Español

NEW YORK (Billboard) — With original programming, its own VJs and an ambitious distribution plan, MTV Tr3s — formerly known as MTV Español — aims to be more than just MTV in Spanish.

The 24-hour bilingual music channel aimed at young U.S. Latinos is relaunching Sept. 25 with the goal of reaching 55 percent of Latino TV households, or 5.5 million homes, by the end of the year.

MTV Español reached 3.1 million Latino households and consisted mainly of eight-hour video blocks that repeated throughout the day, with no on-air talent. The channel now has its own VJs, among them comedian Carlos Santos, who will host "MiTRL," a weekly version of MTV's flagship video countdown. The first episode will feature a live performance by Alejandro Sanz and world premieres of videos by Sanz and Ricky Martin.

The MTV shows "My Super Sweet 16" and "Pimp My Ride" will be offered as "Quiero Mis Quinces," a show about quinceañera parties, and "Pimpeando," which shows off car culture. Subtitles will appear when Spanish is spoken.

'Prada' actress Streep cannot wear the shoes

PARIS (Reuters) — Meryl Streep, who plays a tyrannical fashion magazine editor in the film "The Devil Wears Prada," does not wear shoes by the Italian fashion house.

"I own one pair of Prada shoes. They make my feet hurt," Streep told the latest edition of French magazine Madame Figaro, published last weekend. "It's not the shoes' fault; they are exquisitely made. I blame my feet. I've got my mother's feet."

Johnny Appleseed Day honors one of America's great legends. John Chapman, known as Johnny Appleseed, was among the American settlers who were captivated by the westward movement across the continent. THURSDAY 1918: Man spares Hitler's life

On Sept. 28, 1918, in an incident that would go down in the lore of World War I history — although the details of the event are still unclear — Private Henry Tandey, a British soldier serving near the French village of Marcoing, reportedly encountered a wounded German soldier and declined to shoot him, sparing the life of 29-year-old Lance Corporal Adolf Hitler. As Tandey later told sources, during the final moments of that battle, that he could not kill the man because it wasn't right.

FRIDAY 1994: College student kills ex-girlfriend

Ronald Shamburger, a 22-year-old Texas A&M University student and born-again Christian, killed Lori Ann Baker, a young woman he had briefly dated. Shamburger, who broke into Baker's College Station home as he had on several previous occasions, was surprised to find Baker home and asleep. He shot her in the head, killing her instantly.

After setting fire to Baker's home to destroy the evidence, he realized he had left his car keys inside and then confessed to the crime. At his trial in 1995, he was sentenced to death. Prosecutors noted that in the months before the murder, he had committed a string of burglaries. Shamburger was executed by lethal injection on Sept. 18, 2002, in Huntsville, Texas.

Call Hall to go

The ice cream is from the Call Hall Dairy Bar, and it is sold Monday through Friday from a cart that drives around campus.

K-State ice cream cart makes treat more accessible to students

By Allison Voris
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Call Hall now offers students a new way to cool off while walking between classes.

For about a month, the purple and white ice cream cart has traveled from building to building offering students a cold treat.

"The idea for the traveling cart just came up one day in conversation," Renee Westgate, Dairy Sales manager, said. "We took the idea and ran with it. This has all happened very fast."

The cart was designed as a way to make the dairy store – which some students don't even know exists – more visible, said Tom Herald, professor in animal science and industry.

Some students said they're glad the cart makes the rounds.

"Since Call Hall is on the opposite side of campus from where people usually walk around, I think it's great we have the ice cream come to us," said Tyler Koehn, junior in biology and pre-dentistry. "Some people are lazy and don't want to walk across campus, so the cart is helping them notice the dairy shop, and it's convenient."

The cart is stocked with chocolate, vanilla and strawberry ice-cream cups, as well as ice cream cookie sandwiches.

"I love the idea of selling ice cream in between classes," said Casey Brassfield, senior in social sciences. "Ice cream puts people in a good mood, and everyone should be in a good mood."

The prices of items sold from the ice-cream cart are slightly higher than the ice cream sold at the Call Hall Dairy Bar. However, customers end up getting more in their ice-cream cup.

"The ice-cream cups we sell here are three ounces larger but only $0.25 more than the ice-cream cups you would buy at Call Hall," said Nikki Wright, freshman in kinesiology and ice-cream cart employee. "So the prices are very good, especially for the convenience of the ice cream coming to you."

Nikki Wright, freshman in kinesiology, drives the Call Hall Dairy Bar cart Friday morning to Kedzie Hall.

Students and faculty said they reap the benefits of the ice-cream cart on warm days.

Ambassadors close term as K-State representatives

By Regina Nowak
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Catrina Rawson | COLLEGIAN

Ashley Smit, junior in biology, and Ryan Flickner, senior in agronomy and natural resources, are the current K-State Student ambassadors, who will serve until the next ambassadors are announced on Oct. 28. Students can turn in applications to become the next ambassadors to the K-State Alumni Association at the K-State Alumni Center until 5 p.m. Thursday.

Before last year's All-University Homecoming parade, Ashley Smit said she hadn't thought of becoming a student ambassador. But after hearing her predecessors' presentation, she decided to give it a shot.

And she succeeded.

"The really interesting part for me was the third step, the presentation at Homecoming," Smit, junior in biology, said.

"You need presentations skills and to be creative."

Almost a year ago, during the pre-game show of the Homecoming football game between K-State and Colorado, K-State's student ambassadors were announced for the 2005-06 academic year.

Smit and Ryan Flickner, senior in agronomy and natural resources, were chosen by the student body to represent K-State. Both will serve until new ambassadors are announced on Oct. 28.

This year's deadline for applications for student ambassadors is 5 p.m. Thursday. Students can turn in applications, which are available online, to the K-State Alumni Association at the K-State Alumni Center.

Being a student ambassador is unlike anything else a person can do, Smit said. The ambassadors represent the student body at events throughout Kansas and at university activities.

"I'm bleeding purple," Flickner said. "Therefore, I wanted to get involved, and as a student ambassador, I thought I'd be able to give back to the community, to students and to the alumni – whether they graduated 20 or 50 years ago."

Smit said she enjoys speaking to alumni.

Smit is a first-generation Wildcat and said she was unfamiliar with K-State traditions at the beginning of her term.

"I learned a lot about K-State, about its history and the spirit," she said.

Student ambassadors should be prepared to give a short presentation about student life at K-State at any time during their term, should be ready to attend all activities that happen around the state and should be comfortable with public speaking, said Tom Roesler, adviser of the student ambassadors and associate director of K-State Alumni Association Local Agency.

Cast your vote
Voting for student ambassadors will be from 8:30 a.m. to 5:30 p.m. Oct. 26 in the K-State Student Union and from 11:30 a.m. to 1:30 p.m. at the Derby, Kramer and Van Zile Dining Centers.

"I would always encourage people to learn as much about it as they can, because it is a great experience," Roesler said.

The selection process for student ambassadors involves three steps: the application form, an interview with a student panel and an interview with a faculty or staff panel during which each candidate is asked to give a two- to four-minute presentation on the Homecoming theme.

"You don't really know what you're getting into at first, although they give you some kind of job description," Smit said.

"But you make connections you never thought you would make. So do it, because you have nothing to lose."

Both Flickner and Smit said an ambassador should be passionate and enthusiastic about K-State.

"Go into it with an open mind and be ready to hear very entertaining and interesting stories along the way," Flickner said.

Smit agreed.

"Go to every event you can and enjoy it, because it is only a year, and it goes by so quick," she said.

As a way to involve student representatives at alumni events, the ambassador program began in 1977.

Each ambassador serves a one-year term and receives a $1,500 scholarship from the Alumni Association.

"I always had such great students to work with," Roesler said.

"It's fun to be around the passion and enthusiasm for K-State."

Smit said she's not ready to end her time as an ambassador.

"I'll miss it," she said. "It's probably the best thing I've done at K-State."

Banned Book Week prompts discussion of choosing appropriate literature for age groups

JESSI HERNANDEZ

For those of you who might not have heard (as in most people), this week is Banned Book Week.

According to the American Library Association Web site, this will be the 25th year the week has been observed.

Banned Book Week, according to the ALA, is dedicated to celebrating the freedom to read and to promoting discussion about the implications of censorship, particularly in the education system.

I've always found censorship, particularly with regard to children's literature, a tricky subject. After all, every child has a different level of maturity, and more importantly, different caregivers or guardians who have their own ideas of what is appropriate.

Plus, I honestly can say that in my 12 or so years spent in the Wichita Public Schools-USD 259 system, I can't recall a single incident of a book being banned from any of the schools I attended. Many of the titles on the ALA's list of the 100 most-banned titles from 1990-2000 were books I read throughout elementary, middle and high school.

Since I've never really had a problem with this issue, I feel ill-qualified to take a stand either way.

However, the fact remains that, in many parts of the country, books considered "controversial" for one reason or another are removed from school library shelves. According to the ALA, the most common reasons are because these books contain sexual topics considered inappropriate, "offensive" language, violence, themes that "promote a religious viewpoint," or because they're considered unsuitable for a particular age group.

There very well could be legitimate concerns in regard to some of the titles being challenged, but frankly, when I see that groups of parents for decades have wanted Harper Lee's "To Kill a Mockingbird" outlawed, there's a problem.

I read this book in eighth grade, and to this day, it remains one of my favorites. It addresses sensitive issues of racism and violence, sure, but there isn't anything about it that I believe renders it inappropriate for a middle school student.

I think the problem with censorship is that it becomes a fad. One parent complains a book is inappropriate, and word spreads to other parents, who want to appear just as concerned about their children's education and therefore join in trying to oust it from the local public school library.

But is anyone reading the books?

With the "Harry Potter" series being challenged because it promotes Satanism, I think the answer to that question is no.

I don't think there's anything wrong with parents wanting to have a role in their child's education. However, before they decide to rabble-rouse, they should make sure their concerns are legitimate, as opposed to going off word-of-mouth. If you think a book could be questionable, there's an easy way to find out – open it up and read it.

There exist difficulties of all sorts that involving the decision of what kinds of topics are appropriate for which age group. I greatly respect teachers and librarians for the tough task they have of trying to further their students' education while trying to stay within the bounds of what's acceptable.

While I'm certainly not an authority on issues of censorship – I don't even have a set position for or against it – I think the idea of having a week to start some dialogue about it is a good one and something we all should keep in mind this week.

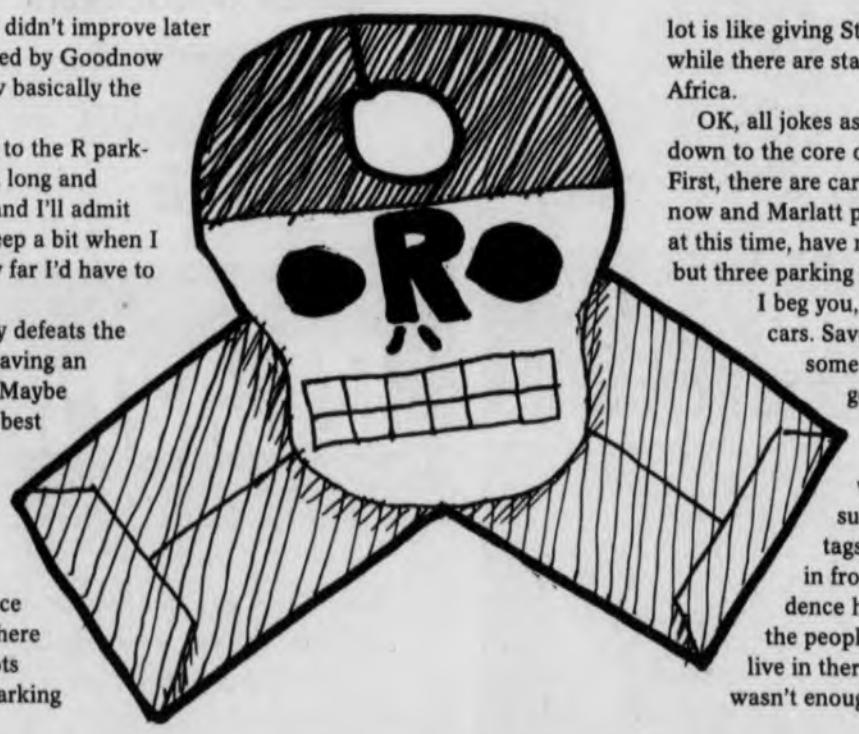
Parking regulations overlook those living in residence halls

JOSH ROUSE

The other day I ventured out to my truck, and I felt great about life. It was a bright, sunny day; birds were chirping – the kind of day when nothing can go wrong.

That is, until I saw a yellow surprise sitting on my windshield.



It was then I realized that I was parked in a GM parking lot with an R permit. Now, a sane person would assume that once you move into a residence hall, you would be able to park in front of it. Or at least near it.

But as I scanned the sea of yellow that was the Marlatt Hall parking lot, I realized that sanity is a scarce commodity.

My mood didn't improve later when I walked by Goodnow Hall and saw basically the same scene.

The drive to the R parking lot was a long and lonely one, and I'll admit that I did weep a bit when I realized how far I'd have to walk.

This really defeats the purpose of having an automobile. Maybe this analogy best describes it: to make people park a mile away from their residence halls while there are open spots in a closer parking lot is like giving Star Jones a cake while there are starving children in Africa.

OK, all jokes aside, let's get down to the core of the problem. First, there are cars in the Goodnow and Marlatt parking lots that, at this time, have not one, not two, but three parking tickets.

I beg you, go move your cars. Save yourselves some money. Avoid getting a wheel lock.

Second, we need to issue new parking tags. Make parking in front of the residence halls available to the people who actually live in there. Even if there wasn't enough room for everybody to park there, I'd still rather have a chance to get a spot than be forbidden from the parking lot all together.

Honestly, if I'm going to pay all this money to live in a residence hall, shouldn't I be able to park there, too?

The problem we are witnessing is the placement of "efficiency" before logic and forgetting about the average Joe who doesn't have a fancy GM pass.

Considering that GM passes are distributed based on seniority, I'd say the average Joe is pretty much the entire freshman class.

Welcome to college, people.

Campus ice cream cart should expand flavor offerings to broaden its appeal

What comes to mind when you think of the local ice cream man? We think of a large truck playing a nice musical jingle and maybe a window and a wide assortment of popsicles and ice cream bars to suit any taste.

We don't think of a purple golf cart.

We're willing to change our conceptions in favor of the new campus ice cream cart, but we would like to see it expand its range of flavors from just vanilla, chocolate and strawberry. The following are the flavors the editorial board would like to see served:

Megan Moser: Ben and Jerry's Oatmeal Cookie Chunk

Anthony Mendoza: Chocolate mint brownie sandwich (which they once had in the press box during football games)

Kerry Fischer: Flintstones push-pops, particularly the orange flavor

Annette Lawless: Pistachio Almond (my dad's homemade ice cream)

Abby Brownback: Chocolate, with Reese's Peanut Butter Cups mixed in

Owen Kennedy: Mint Chocolate Chip, definitely

Leann Sulzen: Purple Pride

Kristen Roderick: Mud Pie, with gummy worms

Emily Lawrence: Pink Panther ice cream popsicles with bubblegum eyeballs and a matching sticker on the side of the cart

Steven Doll: Snickers Ice Cream Bars

Club's zombie talks stump reporter

By Jonas Hogg
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

I already know I'm outclassed. Before the meeting even begins, I'm presented with a handout that looks roughly Greek to me.

My fellow attendees have launched into a discussion about the contents, leaving me even further behind in the conversation.

"You can be a physicalist and think that not everything is causally closed," Christopher French, senior in philosophy, said about one of the handout's points.

Huh?

The source of my confusion is the K-State Philosophy Club's weekly meeting.

Philosophy clubbers have only had an official home for about two years, although the club has existed in various forms for several years. The mind-twisting meetings have covered issues from social and moral philosophy to feminism, environmental ethics and explanations of science.

But today's topic of discussion presents a special interest to the participants.

"A zombie would not feel self-conscious, but they would act as if they were," James Sperman, graduate student in philosophy, said.

But which zombies, exactly, does the group care about?

Is it the Hollywood, drooling monster zombie or the "Caribbean" zombie of Voodoo legend? Neither.

"Imagine your exact duplicate down to the atomic level and beyond, but that is not conscious," Sperman said.

Thankfully, I'm not the only one needing clarification.

Zach Starr, senior in horticulture, and San Conner, junior in music education, work out the details with Sarah Lawver, club president and senior in philosophy.

The clarification comes out. A twin that was not conscious but still acts the same is a zombie. I'm beginning to understand... I hope.

"You can't imagine experiencing nothing. All you can do is imagine not imagining anything," Sperman said.

I'm beginning to imagine a headache.

Discussion varied throughout the meeting, from thought processes to how to justify existence, but all revolved around the same general topic – zombies – and though the concepts were challenging, the group always stopped to clarify.

Lawver said one of the goals is to make the club accessible to everyone, including non-philosophy majors.

"If you come to a meeting, and you're new, and you don't look like you know what's going on, we'll help you out," she said.

The group meets 7-9 p.m. Monday nights in Union 208; confused reporters are optional.

1st rocket launched from New Mexico falters early in trip

By Alicia A. Caldwell
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

UPHAM, N.M. – The first rocket launched from New Mexico's spaceport failed to reach suborbital space Monday, wobbling and dropping back to Earth barely a tenth of the way into its intended journey.

The unmanned, 20-foot SpaceLoft XL rocket, among the first to be launched from any commercial U.S. spaceport, was carrying various experiments and other payloads for its planned journey 70 miles above Earth.

The rocket took off at 2:14 p.m. and was supposed to drop back to Earth about 13 minutes later at White Sands Missile Range, just north of the launch site. But three miles from the launch site, witnesses saw the rocket wobble, then go into a corkscrew motion before disappearing in the clear sky.

Something went wrong shortly after takeoff. Officials with UP Aerospace, the Connecticut-based company that funded the launch, said the rocket reached only about 40,000 feet – or 7 1/2 miles.

It was not immediately clear where the craft landed or what condition it was in. Launch logistical coordinator Tracey Larson said it was possible that the rocket and its payload could have survived the crash.

Despite the crash, the launch still was considered a success because the rocket got airborne, Larson said. "If it was easy, everyone would be doing it," she said.

The rocket launched from a temporary pad at a site in Upham, in southern New Mexico, which also is the planned home of a state-built $225 million spaceport. Richard Branson, founder of the Virgin Group, announced plans last year to base his space tourism company, Virgin Galactic, in New Mexico and to launch manned flights from the spaceport by the end of the decade.

Eric Knight, UP Aerospace CEO, said last week that Monday's flight marked a chance for the public to have "direct access to space." Payload space on one of his rockets ranges from a few hundred dollars to tens of thousands of dollars, depending on size, he said.

Several other UP Aerospace flights are set later this year, Larson said. An Oct. 21 flight is expected to carry the ashes of Mercury astronaut Gordon Cooper and actor James Doohan, who starred as chief engineer Montgomery "Scotty" Scott on the original "Star Trek" TV series.

Columnist doesn't have experience to analyze role of parents to care for dependent children, raise well-adjusted citizens

In her Sept. 25 opinion column, Kelsey Childress states, "There is much more to life for women and men than to be parents."

She speaks without the benefit of many years of experience and could not be more wrong. As the father of seven children, I know from experience that there is nothing more important for men and women than to be good parents. The reason is simple.

A man or woman without a family is responsible only for himself or herself. Mothers and fathers take on the responsibility to dress, feed, clothe, educate, inspire, develop and love children who are incapable of doing these things for themselves. If parents do their duty well, the children learn, grow and develop into well-adjusted adults, good citizens and loving parents to a new generation.

If parents fail in their duty, both the children and society suffer. It is parents, through the procreation, education and development of children, not "people who are willing to dedicate the manpower and hours to come up with something fresh and phenomenal," who ensure the future of the world.

When parents fail in their duties, we understand the meaning of the statement, "We are only one generation away from barbarism."

After a 0-3 start to conference play, K-State volleyball seeks win today

By Jeffrey Rake
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State women's volleyball coach Suzie Fritz has not endured anything like this since 2002.

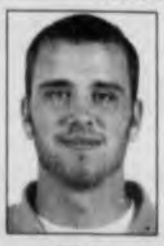
Her team has lost four straight matches – three against Big 12 opponents – and has not won since Sept. 9 against Notre Dame in the University of Northern Iowa Invitational Tournament.

The 0-3 start to conference play is the worst the Wildcats have had since 1993, when they lost every game during Big 8 Conference play. Still, Fritz said she is confident her team will improve and will begin producing at a high level.

"Sometimes you have to fail to appreciate it when the good stuff starts coming – and it will come," Fritz said. "But we can't just sit around and wait for success to knock on our door. We have to go figure some things out."

For the Wildcats (8-5, 0-3 Big 12), getting back to their winning ways does not look easy. Two of their next three matches are against Top-10 opponents Texas and Nebraska – the latter being the No. 1 ranked team in the nation, according to the latest CSTV/AVCA Top-25 volleyball poll.

Before they meet those teams, however, the Wildcats will look to put an end to their losing streak at home against unranked Iowa State Wednesday night at Ahearn Field House.



Sophomore outside hitter Jenny Jantsch said the team is not in a position to panic, but she said it must turn things around sooner rather than later. Facing the Cyclones (9-4, 1-2 Big 12), a team the Wildcats have beaten 20 straight times, might be K-State's best opportunity. Iowa State also has struggled recently, losing in back-to-back matches for the second time this season.

Scrimmage shows basketball team's evolution

Just because the K-State football team didn't look too hot against Louisville on Saturday doesn't mean there wasn't something else for fans to cheer about that morning.

NICK DUNN

The men's basketball team had an open scrimmage in Bramlage Coliseum Saturday before kickoff, and a large turnout of fans came to see the shirts take on the skins. Coach Bob Huggins and his staff could not be there because practice doesn't officially start until mid-October.

The rumor was that six or seven highly rated recruits for the class of 2007 – including studs Michael Beasley and Bill Walker – would watch and possibly play in the scrimmage with current K-State players. However, Beasley and Walker were no-shows, and the recruits who did come, DeJuan Blair and D.J. Kennedy of Pittsburgh, Pa., among others, did not participate.

The scrimmage was an opportunity for fans to see new and old players in action. In the first game, Blake Young, Luis Colon, Akeem Wright, David Hoskins and Chris Merriewether beat Cartier Martin, Jason Bennett, Delivez Yearby, Darren Kent and Jermaine Maybank.

As a fan, these were my impressions of the scrimmage:

■ The most highly anticipated Wildcat recruit in some time – 7-foot-3 Bennett – could be the force down low K-State desperately needs. The five-star recruit, according to rivals.com, out of Florida still needs some polishing on the offensive side, but his defensive presence around the basket will be huge – literally. Plus, the guy can almost grab the rim standing flat-footed.

■ Without the services of point guard Clent Stewart, who is sidelined with a leg injury, it looks like junior-college transfer Blake Young could assume the point duties. Young handled the ball the majority of the time he was in, and he found it easy to score. A scoring point guard would be something new for K-State, and Huggins might have found that in Young, who averaged 23.2 points per game as a combo guard at Daytona Beach (Fla.) Community College a season ago.

■ David Hoskins might have turned into a new player. At only 6-foot-5, someone probably told him he would be a better guard than a post player, because Hoskins looked like a legitimate threat from the outside. No longer did he pass up the open 15-foot jump shot to dribble into the paint and get swatted by players twice his size. Instead, he hit a few guarded three-pointers and doubled his vertical leap, finishing shots with authority.

■ Huggins already seems to be molding his players into high-flying, fast, athletic dunkers. A few – Young, Hoskins and Lance Harris – put on a quick but impressive dunk show at the end of the scrimmage. At one point, Young grabbed the ball from Bennett's outstretched arm, did a mini-windmill and then slammed it home – a fairly remarkable feat for a 6-foot-2 guard.

Basketball season is less than two months away. My advice: get prepared to see a new kind of show inside Bramlage this season.

To conclude the evening, first-year men's basketball coach Bob Huggins will address the crowd.

Fans also will have a chance to win prizes and participate in contests as well as pick up team posters and schedule cards.

RUN | Mendez finishes 9th at Roy Griak Invitational on Saturday

Sophomore Liliani Mendez added to her 2006 campaign with a ninth-place finish at the Roy Griak Invitational on Saturday.

Mendez

Competing against 288 athletes, Mendez's time of 21:43 helped the Wildcats to a 20th-place team finish.

Mendez was the second Big 12 runner to cross the line behind Iowa State's Lisa Koll, who finished seventh.

Behind Mendez, the duo of freshman Lindsay Pierson and junior Morgan Bonds finished 108th and 109th, respectively.

The complete team effort for the women didn't go unnoticed, as the Wildcats knocked off in-state rival Kansas, who finished 22nd.

Bees swarm sugary garbage cans

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Honey bees have been gathering around trash cans on campus for the past two weeks.

"It is the peak time of the population for honey bees," said Sharon Dobesh, pesticide coordinator in the Department of Entomology. "They are just looking for new sources of nutrition since flower populations are declining."

Dobesh said the bees are attracted to anything sweet like ice cream, soda or candy. They gather around garbage cans because many people throw away open containers of soda and partially eaten candy bars.

John Woods, director of custodial services for the Department of Facilities, said he placed two bowls of ice cream outside opposite ends of Hale Library. Bees immediately swarmed to the bowls in search of food. Woods said although the bees did swarm more quickly on one side of Hale, he still has not determined from where the bees come.

Dobesh said the bees probably are foraging for their nest and might have come from someone in Manhattan who has honey bee hives.

Until the source of the bees can be found, Woods said students need to be more careful with their garbage. He said students need to put tops back on their drinks or pour them out on the grass before they throw them away. Students also should not throw away any type of open wrapper or container of sweet substances like jelly or candy.

Although honey bees are usually not dangerous to the public, they can be life-threatening to people who are allergic to them. Honey bees can only sting once in their lifetime, but they usually travel in groups, Dobesh said.

"It's kind of annoying, but there is nothing you can do about it," Frankie Morales, sophomore in anthropology, said. "I do not expect the garbage people to come by every five minutes and clear the garbage cans."

No incidents of stings or other problems have been reported, but since this is a time of the year when the bee population is high, people still need to be careful. Dobesh said the best way to avoid confrontation with the bees is to stay out of their way. They usually do not actively seek people unless they are agitated or provoked.

Many students are not worried about the bees, though, especially with the approach of colder weather.

"Winter is coming, so most of the bees should die anyway," Morales said.

Stocks rise as Fed says inflation will slow

By Ellen Simon
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK – Stocks rose smartly Monday after Dallas Federal Reserve President Richard Fisher suggested inflation would be dampened by a slowing economy and said while the housing and auto sectors are economic weak points, the rest of the U.S. economy is doing "extremely well."

The bond market, however, seems convinced an economic downturn and cuts in the Fed's benchmark short-term interest rate are on the way. The yield on the 10-year Treasury note fell to 4.54 percent from 4.59 percent Friday. The yield on the 10-year Treasury bill has quickly plummeted and now stands at a seven-month low.

Fisher's remarks pushed stocks higher in what had been a session of seesaw trading, with investors first bidding stocks higher on lower oil prices, then sending them lower on falling housing prices. Investors, alert to any sign of a sharp economic slowdown, have been especially skittish in recent sessions as data has shown a slowing housing market while bond yields and oil prices have fallen hard.

While the steep and sudden falloff in bond yields, slowing housing and lower commodities prices seem to indicate the economy will grow at a slower pace, not every investor feels the slowdown will be dramatic.

"The pace of growth could slow down, but that doesn't mean the market is going to get killed," said Philip S. Dow, managing director of equity strategy at RBC Dain Rauscher in Minneapolis. "I think it's early to talk about a recession."

The Dow Jones industrial average gained 67.71, or 0.59 percent, to 11,575.81.

Broader stock indicators also advanced. The Standard & Poor's 500 index rose 11.59, or 0.88, to 1,326.37, and the Nasdaq composite index rose 30.14, or 1.36 percent, to 2,249.07.

Advancing issues led decliners by more than 2 to 1 on the New York Stock Exchange, where consolidated volume came to 3.80 billion shares, up from 2.26 billion Friday. The technology, consumer discretionary and utilities sectors were the day's biggest gainers.

Stocks bounced higher at the open Monday after oil prices fell to six-month lows when BP PLC said it had permission to restart the eastern half of Alaska's Prudhoe Bay oil field, which should expand oil inventories. Oil prices rose in the afternoon, with a barrel of light crude settling at $61.45, up 90 cents, on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

SHANGHAI'S TOP LEADER REMOVED

SHANGHAI, China – Shanghai's top leader was dismissed Monday for alleged corruption, the highest-level official to be fired in more than a decade as President Hu Jintao consolidates his power.

Chen Liangyu was fired as Shanghai's Communist Party secretary, kicked off the party's powerful Politburo and is under investigation by its anti-graft watchdog, the official Xinhua News Agency said. His dismissal "demonstrates the party's determination to fight corruption," Xinhua said.

THAI MILITARY RULERS MIGHT FREEZE ASSETS

BANGKOK, Thailand – Thailand's military rulers might freeze the assets of ousted Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra and members of his cabinet if evidence is found that they tried to transfer their wealth abroad, the head of a newly appointed anti-corruption panel said Monday.

The military council that ousted Thaksin last week also announced it would have a say in the creation of a new permanent constitution, reserving a political role for itself despite its vow to hand over power to an interim civilian government.

PAKISTAN DENIES KNOWING BIN LADEN'S STATUS, WHEREABOUTS

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan – Pakistan's president and foreign ministry said Monday they do not know where Osama bin Laden is hiding or if he is dead or alive, but they placed a high priority on finding out.

The comments came amid renewed speculation about bin Laden's status after a French newspaper report this weekend cited a leaked French secret service document as saying the al-Qaeda leader died of typhoid in Pakistan last month.

ICE CREAM | Cart runs late April to mid-October

some ice cream to cool off," Koehn said.

"It reminds me of childhood and getting ice cream from the ice-cream truck on a hot day, minus the ice-cream truck music."

Call Hall plans to run the cart as long as weather permits, because colder temperatures are not ideal for selling ice cream.

"Warm days like last Friday can be crazy," Wright said. "We almost sold out of all of our ice cream."

The cart will travel through campus from about the end of April to the middle of October each year, Herald said.

Students can purchase the same ice cream with more options from the recently remodeled Dairy Bar in Call Hall. The Dairy Bar also offers milk, cheese, butter and meat from the K-State agriculture program.

ATHLETICS | ID-only ticketing a possibility

more than most campus employees are paid.

"These kids earn it," said Bob Cavello, associate director of athletics for business operations. "We work hard; we work on weekends when you guys are studying. To attract good people, we have to pay a competitive wage."

Cavello and Casey Scott, associate athletic director for operations, said they would want the allocation increased if minimum wage was increased, in order to remain competitive. The athletics department spends a total of $880,553 on employee pay. Student positions vary from working in the administrative departments to jobs in concession stands on game days.

Because those expenses remain stable from year to year, Cavello suggested subjecting the allocation to a six-year review, instead of the three-year review that is the status quo for most organizations. The committee voted to keep a three-year review.

As a condition of the allocation, the athletics department offers football and men's basketball tickets to students at a discounted rate.

Student football tickets must be at least $2 less, and basketball tickets must be at least $1 less than general admission tickets. As it stands, student football ticket prices are less than half the price of other K-State football tickets.

"The reality is that students pay less than half of the regular price for tickets and pay for the privilege fee that provides that," Matt Wagner, privilege fee committee chair, said.

Because the privilege fee and allocation help make discounted tickets possible, the group also discussed ways to discourage the sale of student tickets to non-students and a date at which unsold student tickets could be sold to the public.

"When students sell their tickets to other fans, the athletic department is denied the opportunity to sell to the people we want to benefit, and it doesn't help our program grow," Scott said.

Currently, students can get into games with a ticket and a K-State student ID, but they don't necessarily have to match, making it easy for students to sell their tickets online or to non-students.

In the future, students might have to present tickets and IDs with matching numbers. At some point, tickets could be put onto IDs electronically, eliminating the need to print paper tickets.

The problem with that, the committee pointed out, is that students would not be able to sell or trade their tickets to other students if they had to miss a game, and some students might be less likely to buy them.

The athletics department and the committee plan to look into the possibility of trading only in an online marketplace to regulate ticket sales.

However, the marketplace would provide the athletics department with an alternative source of revenue, Student Body President Lucas Maddy said.

"We as students should probably be compensated in some way for that," Maddy said.

Another problem with ID-only ticketing is that students might sell their IDs, an action for which a student could be held liable for the behavior of a person who used his or her ID.

The committee will review the legislation and present it to Student Senate before a final decision is made.

"We just appreciate the feedback they gave us, the questions, the ideas," Scott said. "We like to hear some of their concerns."

win because we haven't had one in awhile," Jantsch said. "Each person needs to bring it upon themselves to go to each practice and each match prepared. We know we have to win on Wednesday."

Fritz said one of the biggest problems for the Wildcats has been their inability to get off to a fast start. They have made a routine of falling behind early in matches, and it has caught up with them now that their competition has gotten more difficult.

"We have the ability to play well, but we know that... that's never been a question," Fritz said. "However, we haven't been able to prove that we can play well over time."

Junior libero Angie Lastra said the losing streak has taken its toll on the team, but added that the Wildcats need to remain optimistic if they are to turn around their play.

"We are honestly a little bit frustrated, because we think we are doing the right stuff," Lastra said. "But we just need to go forward, keep working hard and try to get out of this hole."

Though outside hitter Sandy Werner is the only senior on the team, the Wildcats have not placed the blame for the losing streak on their youthfulness. Instead, they have pointed to tactical errors, inconsistency and mental mistakes. However, these reasons do not make the losses easier to take, Werner said.

"It does suck to lose," she said. "I think our team needs to have a sense of urgency to get better... it will come."

Hazing case against fraternity members tests Florida's new law

By Bill Kaczor
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TALLAHASSEE, Fla. – Marcus Jones said he had a ruptured ear drum and injuries to his buttocks that required 25 stitches after his initiation into the Kappa Alpha Psi fraternity at Florida A&M University.

He told his parents that for four days he was blindfolded, paddled with wooden canes and punched with boxing gloves.

Jones, a sophomore, wanted to keep the February incident quiet, but his father called police. They charged five fraternity brothers under a new Florida law that makes hazing a felony if it results in serious bodily injury or death. Possible penalties range from probation to five years in prison.

The case is the first significant test of one of the nation's toughest anti-hazing laws. Opening statements in the trial start Wednesday, which is the middle of National Hazing Prevention Week, an event organized by the Association of Fraternity Advisors.

Forty-four states have anti-hazing laws, but Florida is one of the few that has made it a serious criminal offense, said retired Pennsylvania Judge Mitch Crane, an anti-hazing advocate who has been following the case.

"If these young men are found guilty, and if they are sent to jail, then it will have national implications," Crane said Monday before beginning a Hazing Prevention Week speaking tour.

Jones, 19, of Decatur, Ga., has not returned to school. His attorney did not respond to requests for comments to The Associated Press.

"My son went off to school healthy and happy. He returned busted up and bruised," his father, Army Master Sgt. Mark Jones, recently told The Miami Herald. "He looked like a soldier you see on 'M.A.S.H.'"

The defendants, Brian Bowman, 23; Cory Gray, 22; Jason Harris, 25; Marcus Hughes, 21, and Michael Morton, 23, have been suspended pending the outcome of the case. The university also has suspended the fraternity chapter until 2013.

Lawyer Chuck Hobbs, who represents all the defendants except Harris, said he would present evidence that Jones failed to identify who hit him.

He also plans to argue the law fails to define the term "serious bodily injury" and plans to cite medical evidence he claimed would show Jones has fully recovered.

"The injuries that he has complained about we don't believe rise to the nature of serious bodily injuries," Hobbs said Monday.

The Florida law was inspired by the 2001 death of 18-year-old Chad Meredith during Rush Week at the University of Miami. The freshman from Indianapolis drowned while trying to swim across a campus lake with two Kappa Sigma fraternity brothers after a bout of drinking.

Florida's prior hazing law lacked criminal penalties, instead allowing schools to take administrative action such as suspending fraternities and students. The new law made another significant change – the argument that someone consented to hazing can't be used as a defense.

That argument previously made it difficult to prosecute hazing cases as battery or under other criminal laws, officials said.

'The Black Dahlia' is stylish, but unfocused

"The Black Dahlia"

Grade: D+

Review by Brendan Praeger

A week ago I would have predicted that "The Black Dahlia" would be one of the best films I'd see all year. Unfortunately, most films that make amazing three-and-a-half-minute trailers don't turn into great 121-minute movies.

The cinematography and set design perfectly captures the dark side of Los Angeles in the 1940s, and the the narration by Josh Hartnett drags the movie as close as possible to the film-noir style to which it aspires.

It's almost as if "Dragnet" and "Se7en" had a dark and mysterious love child, but the child turned out to be a serial killer with Attention Deficit Disorder.

The acting lives up to the high standards one would expect from a Brian De Palma film, with one notable exception: Scarlett Johansson. Johansson seems to try too hard in every role she plays. Sure, she's pretty, but after "Match Point," "The Island" and "Lost in Translation," her overrated status in Hollywood is as big a mystery as the brutal murder this film supposedly is about.

Despite the pretty cover, "The Black Dahlia" slips from a compelling story of two detectives into a jumbled collection of underdeveloped storylines, most of which are tied together as well as a first grader's tennis shoes at the end of an afternoon at the swimming pool. The murder that's supposedly the focus of the film doesn't happen until the halfway point, and it becomes entirely uninteresting shortly thereafter.

I'm not sure how a plot that includes boxing, a bank heist, stag films, a mutilated corpse and lesbian sex scene could go wrong. I guess that's probably "The Black Dahlia's" crowning achievement.

Sequel relies on slapstick, falls short of 1st film

Movie review by Brendan Praegar

When a film uses negative reviews in its advertisements, it's usually aimed at a highly specific audience. With "Jackass: Number Two," the magical target audience is people who lack both maturity and the ability to be offended or disgusted.

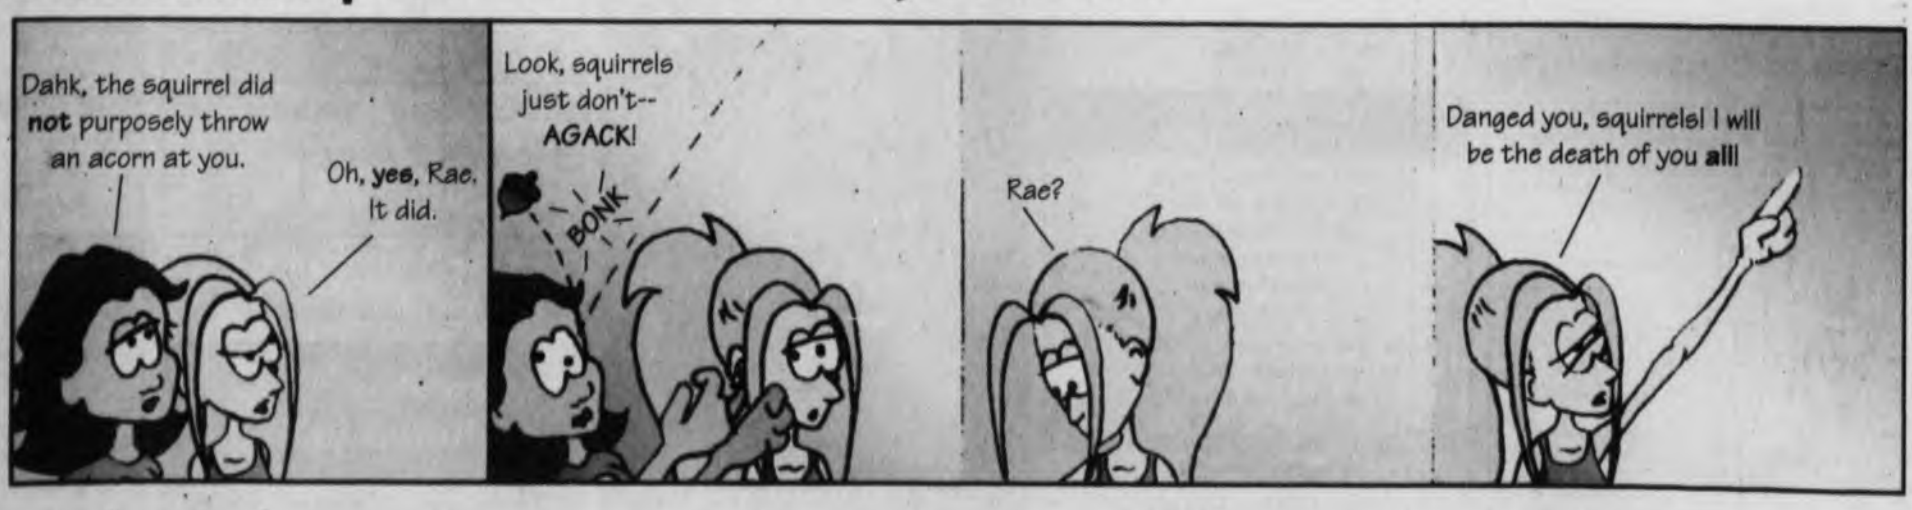
Luckily, plenty of moviegoers fit that description. In fact, the movie topped the box office this past weekend, bringing in $28 million.

I honestly can say the first "Jackass" is the hardest I've ever laughed in a movie theater. I'll admit it – I'm not entirely ashamed to be part of a group that can be easily entertained by an hour-and-a-half of penis and fart jokes.

Almost the entire crew returns for the sequel, although it seems like a collection of deleted scenes that weren't good enough for the original film.

There's a shift in the type of stunts performed, which takes the film farther into the depths of depravity and pushes the R rating to its ambiguous limit. The candid camera scenes are almost entirely gone, save for some public nudity that would only please the American Association of Retired Persons audience.

Instead, the film mostly relies on gross-out humor. Steve-O must suck at rock-paper-scissors, because he's the victim of the most disturbing scenes. He shoves a fishhook through his cheek, sticks a leech to his eyeball, and subsequently vomits into a fart mask and takes a beer bong anally. Chris Pontius drinks horse semen. Dave England wears a beard of pubic hair – fun stuff.



Despite the abundance of feces and male nudity, this is an enjoyable movie to watch. It's not as funny as its predecessor, but anyone with a love of slapstick humor should appreciate medicine-ball dodge ball in the dark.

It's gross, tasteless and more of an unfocused documentary of stupidity than a comedy, but anyone who likes "Jackass" should give it a try. Everyone else probably should steer clear.

1/4-cent sales tax repealed

By Megan Moser
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Commissioners voted to end a quarter-cent sales tax, supporting USD 383 Manhattan-Ogden, at a special session Tuesday.

The tax increase was aimed at getting the school district out of a budget deficit that, without an alternate source of funding, might have meant cuts in music, Spanish, technology and extracurricular programs.

The increase passed in April 2005 and took effect in October 2005, Diane Stoddard, deputy city manager, said.

Though the legislation had a built-in three-year stop date and a cap of $5.4 million, the school board moved to end the tax early because it thought the tax had served its purpose.

Several city commissioners praised the board's motion to end the tax at its Sept. 20 meeting, saying it was responsible not to take advantage of the extra funds.

Student injured at philanthropy

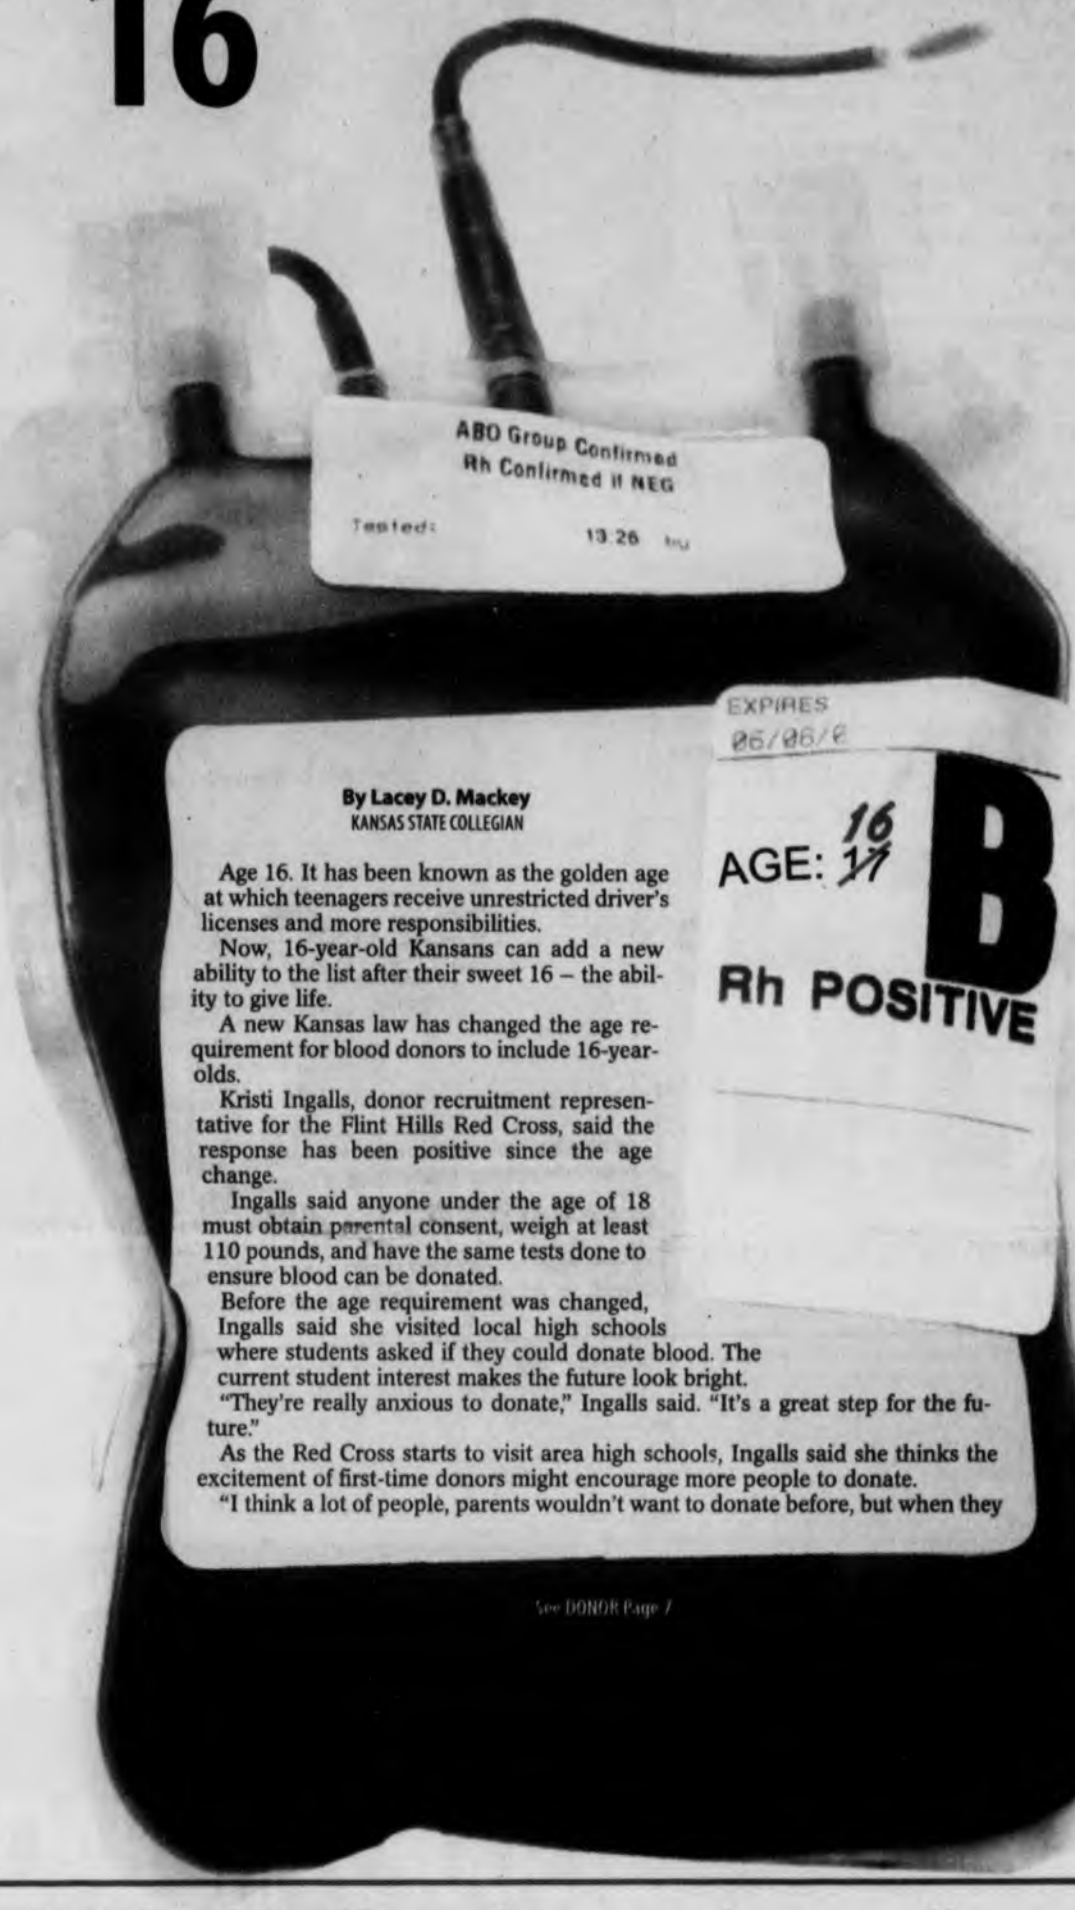
Luke Short, junior in electrical engineering, is recovering quickly from surgery on a vertebrae that he broke Sunday morning at a charity event at Tuttle Creek Lake, said Andrew Wessel, Short's cousin.

"He is already progressing faster and faster now than they thought he was going to," said Wessel, freshman in architectural engineering and a fellow member of Short in Phi Kappa Theta fraternity.

Short was injured while at Mudbowl, a mud volleyball charity function sponsored by Sigma Kappa sorority. Jamie Grittman, event coordinator for Sigma Kappa, declined to comment.



The morning of his injury, Short participated in Kappa Alpha Theta's WildKAT Chase 5k run with Wessel. After the run, Wessel said the two parted ways, and Short went to Mudbowl.

Wessel said people told him Short arrived before his team's play time and decided to take a swim. While he was under water, Short hit his head on a rock and stopped swimming.

Change in Kansas law lowers blood donors' required age to 16 years old

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Age 16. It has been known as the golden age at which teenagers receive unrestricted driver's licenses and more responsibilities.

Now, 16-year-old Kansans can add a new ability to the list after their sweet 16 – the ability to give life.

A new Kansas law has changed the age requirement for blood donors to include 16-year-olds.

Kristi Ingalls, donor recruitment representative for the Flint Hills Red Cross, said the response has been positive since the age change.

Ingalls said anyone under the age of 18 must obtain parental consent, weigh at least 110 pounds, and have the same tests done to ensure blood can be donated.

Before the age requirement was changed, Ingalls said she visited local high schools where students asked if they could donate blood. The current student interest makes the future look bright.

"They're really anxious to donate," Ingalls said. "It's a great step for the future."

As the Red Cross starts to visit area high schools, Ingalls said she thinks the excitement of first-time donors might encourage more people to donate.

"I think a lot of people, parents wouldn't want to donate before, but when they

By Jonas Hogg
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

General Richard B. Myers gave a speech to a McCain Auditorium crowd that filled orchestra seating and overflowed into the balcony.

World War II veterans, current Reserve Officer Training Corps and Junior ROTC cadets attended the event, which was the inaugural lecture in the Leaders in Residence lecture series.

Myers, a K-State alumnus, serves as the foundation professor of military history at K-State and visits the university about three times a semester.

"My parents might believe a lot of things about me... but they would never believe anyone would ever address me as a professor," he said.

In addition to a professorship here, Myers teaches at the National Defense University and serves on both corporate and non-profit boards.

Myers spoke on his military career and applied the leadership lessons he learned in his 40-plus years in the Air Force to everyday life.

The appeal of his military career, Myers said, was its zero tolerance for discrimination, working where people really count and serving something bigger than yourself.

Knowing how to make effective and ethical decisions will be a greater challenge for those entering the work force, he said, giving an example of an ethical dilemma he faced that required him to excuse himself from a general officer promotion board.

Such decisions, he said, are not easy to make.

"There may be consequences, but the consequences of going down the other path are unacceptable," he said.

Myers also spoke about preparing for future personal and global challenges, integrity and selfless service.

"It only progresses if we use our noodles and our leadership skills," he said. "By the time you all are at the helm, I'll be in my rocking chair hoping you're doing a good job."

After his speech, Myers took questions on topics ranging from pre-war Iraqi intelligence to diversity and the roles of media in a democracy.

Having a former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff is a powerful start to the program, said Susan Scott, assistant vice president and Leadership Studies director.

"His message was so on-point with ours," she said.

Though many first- and second-year leadership students were in attendance, also present was 86-year-old retired Air Force colonel and K-State faculty member Lee Ruggles. In 1965 Ruggles commissioned Myers a second lieutenant in the United States Air Force.

Ruggles, head of K-State's Air Force ROTC in 1964-68, spent his time launching careers that include two four-star Air Force generals. With his wife, Lea, he took great pride in the advances of his former students.

"He's a people person, with none of the arrogance you may associate with someone with four stars," Ruggles said. "We're so proud of him."

Myers said Ruggles has been an influential person, pushing him to excel and always believing in him.

Though Myers related stories from his military background, he emphasized that the lessons he took from his years of service apply everywhere.

"It really doesn't matter what skill you're learning if you can't make things happen," he said. "And you make things happen through your leadership."

Students register to vote at drive

By Allison Voris
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students had the opportunity to register to vote during the KSU Young Democrats' voter registration drive on Tuesday.

"There's a midterm election Nov. 7, so we're trying to get everyone who wants to vote to be able to vote," said Aaron Apel, senior in philosophy and political science and president of Young Democrats. "We also want to get awareness out about the voting.

You must be registered 15 days before the voting takes place to be able to vote."

The organization set up a booth in the K-State Student Union with information about voting and registration, making the information accessible to students.

"I was walking though the Union on my way to my car, and I ended up getting registered to vote," Robert Simon, junior in English, said.

"Someone came to my door the other day trying to get me to register, and I didn't even fill that out. This was really easy, though."

Young Democrats also is trying to set up a registration booth with the KSU College Republicans.

"We're trying to show more of a united front on campus, because many people view the Young Democrats and College Republicans as either totally left-winged or totally right-winged, and that's not true," Apel said. "We want to work with the College Republicans to show more of a middle ground."

The Young Democrats and College Republicans also have worked together to facilitate campus debates that raise political awareness on campus.

"We're trying to get a strong hold on uniting people with similar ideological views. We want to support our party, local candidates, and bring about some change as well as raise political awareness and involvement."

Aaron Apel
KSU YOUNG DEMOCRATS PRESIDENT

"We had a debate last year that went very well," Apel said. "We'd like to have one once a semester."

Young Democrats has been at K-State for about five years and has about 24 members, Apel said.

"We're trying to get a strong hold on uniting people with similar ideological views," Apel said. "We want to support our party, local candidates, and bring about some change as well as raise political awareness and involvement."

Members of Young Democrats volunteer on campaigns for local candidates. This usually involves chalking sidewalks and going door to door, Apel said.

"The bottom line is we're here to raise awareness and show support for our party," Apel said. "That can be as simple as writing an opinion article in the Collegian or getting out and voting."

The next meeting for Young Democrats will be 7:30 p.m. Thursday in Union 205.

Facebook opens to all users by eliminating network requirement

By Megan Molitor
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Facebook.com has added a new element to allow anyone to open an account with the friend-connecting Web site.

Previously, individuals only were able to join if they were in college or high school or had a business or work e-mail.

The new expansion allows anyone to join by removing the requirement that users be part of a network to sign up for an account.

These changes went into effect Tuesday.

According to an online message from Facebook employee Carolyn Abram, people now allowed to create profiles include those who graduated pre-Facebook and those whose schools or work do not offer e-mail.

"We started at one school, and realized over and over again that this site was useful to everyone, not just to Harvard students and not just to college students," Abram said. "We've kept growing to accommodate this fact."

These changes do not give all users access to all Facebook profiles.

Abram said profiles are just as private as before, and the network structure will stay the same.

"College and work networks still require an authenticated e-mail address to join," she said. "Only people in your networks and confirmed friends can see your profile."

The new openness of the site has met with mixed responses from users.

"I've seen the new changes, and I'm not happy about them," Jorge Flores, freshman in business administration, said.

"Facebook was first made for college students, and that's how it should stay. Now everybody can know details about your life."

Other users are more positive about the new feature.

"I think everyone should be able to access Facebook, so that more people can be involved," Katie Imel, senior in secondary education, said. "If there are more people, it's easier to contact old friends."

Imel said she also has a MySpace.com account but prefers Facebook, even with the new changes.

"Facebook is easier to use for me and easier to find people I'm looking for," she said. "I think the new changes could help."

The Web site also recently built more privacy controls. Users concerned with who can view their account can change their privacy settings to prevent people from finding them in searches.

According to an article in The New York Times, Viacom offered Facebook creator Mark Zuckerberg $750 million in January.

He refused the offer, and last week Yahoo offered him $900 million for the site. However, a deal has not been finalized.

Fair trial?

If former President Bush isn't on trial for war crimes, Saddam Hussein shouldn't be either

Illustrations by Jordan Mizell | COLLEGIAN

ZACHARY T. ECKELS

I'm sure there are many of you reading this who wouldn't even want a trial for the leaders who killed as many as 125,000 innocent Iraqis. Many of you probably would call for their blood before a trial after learning that about 1 million more have died from their actions years back.

But before you make your final decision that war crimes committed nearly 20 years ago really don't need a fair trial, you should know the men discussed above are former President George H.W. Bush and his administration.

According to the book "Lying for Empire: How to Commit War Crimes With a Straight Face," by David Model, 19 war crimes were committed beyond a reasonable doubt by former President Bush and his administration.

Their crimes include, but definitely are not limited to, former President Bush's command to "destroy facilities essential to civilian life and economic productivity throughout Iraq." The military intentionally bombed schools, hospitals, mosques, churches and other controversial areas while using prohibited weapons capable of mass destruction.

The International War Crimes Tribunal was composed of 22 judges representing 18 nations. The only thing that saved these men – George Bush, James Baker, Colin Powell, Dick Cheney and others – was that the tribunal had no legitimacy as an international court.

But just because the court was illegitimate doesn't mean they didn't hold a fair trial. With judges from the United States, Britain, India and Turkey, the men's actions were judged adequately.

So now we find ourselves 20 years after our own war crimes were committed. Yes, prior to that first war, Saddam Hussein had killed about 180,000 innocent civilians, according to the current prosecution, during an attempt to raid Kurdish guerrilla. Nobody will argue Hussein was extremely wrong for doing that.

But this situation can't be handled like a criminal murder case, which can be reopened after 20 years. If it's too late to charge former President Bush, it's too late to charge Hussein.

After comparing Hussein's crimes to former President Bush's, I hope you at least can see why he shouldn't be on trial in the first place. But I'm sure most of you will point out that Hussein was a dictator and that the trial will treat him fairly.

Well, as far as Hussein being a dictator, I tend to agree with a quote from the first judge, Judge Abdullah al-Amiri, in his trial. "You are not a dictator," he said to Hussein. "You were not a dictator. However, the people or the individuals and officials surrounding you created a dictator. It was not you in particular. It happens all over the world."

When Hussein was in power, he was ruthless, merciless and cruel. But at the very least, he deserves a fair trial. If we don't give him that, we are no better.

As president said, Iraq war will be a comma in world's history

JONAS HOGG

Hem and haw, despair and agony. The president has opened his mouth and sent forth ineloquences to scour the world.

The nation's collective cheeks clench when things of this nature happen – "I like to tell people when the final history is written on Iraq, it will look like just a comma. ... My point is, there's a strong will for democracy."

Thus spoke the president to Wolf Blitzer on CNN and then found himself heaped in brimstone.

I'm not, in any stretch, crazy or stupid enough to defend that remark, but I'll make an honest effort to point out the idiocy of our vehement response.

Americans fear nothing more than irrelevancy. Shame, loss, action before thought and resultant disaster are all preferential to simply not mattering. We just love the spotlight after all.

So when the grand rama-lama of the country tells us that a few thousand kicked off, more than that ripped up but alive, and a goodly sum of our inflating tax dollars will be remembered as nothing more than a "," there begins the usual process of teeth gnashing and flailing.

All this should come as expected, one supposes, that one nation should expect its paltry war of less than a decade to reverberate throughout the corridors of history. Before we dive into the open mouth of indignation, let's have a bit of humbling.

In the Battle of the Somme, more than 300,000 people were killed. Do you know when the battle was? In what war it was fought? Where?

More than 40,000 people were killed, captured or wounded during three days in 1863. Do you know where? What battle? Can you name any of the 40,000?

At least 50,000 people have died within the last 18 months as a result of ethnic genocide. Where? What, if anything, is being done?

Do you know who the Sandanistas were?

The president's statements, while unpopular, are accurate, and the anger and resentment welling up indicates to me that we know it. I doubt we are dull enough to imagine that an entire history of war will pay homage to our half-hearted efforts in bombing the Middle East into a higher moral order.

There are, of course, those who pay the price. Poor families in rural areas with a folded flag on the mantle. The youth pulverized by shrapnel and hospital-bound for life. The fiancée who will live with an empty engagement ring. The maimed, twisted, crippled, scarred, the bearers of burdens so horrible we would rather not think about them. These are the shattered remnants history will forget.

Despite our whooping and hollering, history likely will remember this war no more than any other.

War correspondent Martha Gellhorn perhaps left us with the best perspective: "War is a malignant disease (comma) an idiocy (comma) a prison (comma) and the pain it causes is beyond telling or meaning (semicolon) but war was our condition and our history (comma) the place we had to live in."

Period.

Facebook's all-inclusive expansion works against original base — college students

A few years ago, Facebook.com grew rapidly in popularity at K-State. Students seemed to enjoy a Web site designed for them and for them only: a site that acted as a medium between themselves and friends, either at K-State or other colleges.

Facebook also was popular because it differed from MySpace.com, a site that allowed anyone to create a profile. However, since Facebook now is open to anyone, it is no longer a MySpace alternative but its twin.

MySpace is widely popular among students of all ages and non-students. It seems Facebook is trying to match this by expanding to include everyone. This addition is contrary to Facebook's origin.

Why should students choose Facebook if it offers only the same features that are available through MySpace? There needs to be distinct differences between the two; if there are not, individuals will not choose to use both, but rather the Web site with which they already are affiliated.

If Facebook wants to continue to appeal to incoming college students, it should appeal just to college students and not to anyone with any kind of e-mail address. Facebook should recognize what made it so popular with college students initially and use that to its advantage.

There is nothing wrong with just anyone having an online profile. But that's the purpose of MySpace.

In calling liberals stupid, columnist proves to be no better than the people he criticizes

Editor,

Chuck Armstrong, in your opinion article Monday, you simply stated your opinion, and that's OK. All you really did was the same thing you say liberals do.

You say they are stupid for not agreeing with the president. That's pretty much all you did. Chuck, it's the Golden Rule at play, I guess. You did not get under my skin or that of other liberals (I hope not), so don't go jumping up and down for a job well done – just yet.

All you did was the exact same thing everyone else does. By that I mean the people you are talking about; you're just on the other side of the spectrum – still the same intelligence level that you claim they are – so nothing special.

Michael Moore did a documentary about his opinions and is not a spokesperson for us.

I just wanted to make sure that was all clear. Too bad we do not have a thing of some kind of rights that were written on paper somewhere. Hmm, oh well.

You spoke your mind. You can point and make fun of high school dropouts as long as you know that that does not make you look better. It doesn't matter if it is Green Day; your making fun of people who were lucky to make it big does not mean they are dumb. They just might have made a mistake by not securing their futures, but you know, I think they will do just fine, just like the president is.

This War on Terror or Oil, whatever you want to call it – I prefer Mr. Bush's War – is a waste of time. That's just an opinion.

I have the freedom to make it; you have the freedom to take it or not. I agree with going after bin Laden but not going to Iraq. I can see how Bush was a good businessman; he is charming, which also makes him a good front man. I do not make fun of him or call him stupid, I just disagree with him – a lot.

All liberals are not like the celebrities you say teach us our politics. No, they just happen to have more media time than the rest of us average Joes. Go figure.

Some of us liberals are a little more constructive than you say we are. We know Bush went to Ivy League schools and do not need to be told that. We just disagree with the guy and his administration.

Just like the good professors who express their opinions to their communities in a constructive way, we can't get as much attention from the media as Sean Penn.

I disagree with the administration as a whole. I also dislike it for the choices it makes, not its wit.

Sure, we might have Moore and Penn, but at least they aren't Hannity and Limbaugh.

Every time a liberal tries to say something constructive to Hannity at a campus he is visiting, he gets the crowd going by saying, "Oh no, it's a hostile liberal."

Then you have Rush Limbaugh's beliefs on drug abusers.

Need I say more here, except that these two are no more reporters of the news or of politics than they are just a couple of right-wing cheerleaders?

So make sure next time you look at the social spectrum of a topic that you actually look at it before you get caught sounding like those you are apparently writing about.

I am liberal. I love my country. I am not liberal because it's the trendy thing to do; I am actually liberal because I believe in the core liberal beliefs rather than those of the conservatives.

Doctors at Lafene Health Center earned same degrees as doctors at private clinics

Editor,

I feel compelled to write regarding the student quotes in the article about Lafene Health Center's services and to offer an alternate viewpoint. Lafene is an excellent resource for any student seeking the care of a primary care physician.

It is unfair to say that Lafene does not staff "real doctors," as was quoted by one of the students interviewed for the column. I can speak with first-hand knowledge of two of Lafene's doctors, Dr. Tackett and Dr. Wolfe.

Dr. Tackett was my family physician at Cotton O'Neil in Wamego, Kan., before he left to become Lafene's medical director. I was always pleased with the level of care he provided to my two young children. He is detail-oriented, knowledgeable and compassionate. My husband, Dr. Wolfe, is a K-State graduate and has the same education as a primary care physician at a private clinic would have.

He completed four years undergraduate, four years of medical school and three years of residency. He worked at Cotton O'Neil for two years before leaving to accept the position at Lafene. He continues to update his education through Continuing Medical Education classes, and he is board-certified.

He continues to offer the same excellent care at Lafene as he did when he worked in a "real" clinic. He is a young doctor and has had many offers to work other places.

He chooses to work at Lafene because he loves K-State, and it is important to him that the students get excellent health care at an affordable price.

Avoiding profanity demonstrates maturity; cussing doesn't benefit team, university

Editor,

What is the need for such poor behavior by our student section at the football games this year?

Does it do anyone any good to spout vulgar language in front of 30,000-plus other people just because you can?

Does it benefit the university to let the nation believe that our students can't think of anything better to say than foul cuss words in the middle of a song? Does it honestly "psych" the other team out to hear raunchy language and crude comments when they take the field?

Is it worth losing the privilege of singing the song just to prove a pointless point?

C'mon, K-Staters – use the brains God gave you and show some respect for those around you, as well as the K-State band and coaches Snyder and Prince and the team.

The pressure should be on to act like the educated young men and women you want to be considered, not the selfish children you're letting yourselves be seen as.

Lifters must use right technique in bench press, squat to build strength safely

By Trent Scott
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The bench press is the lift to do if you want bulging pectoral muscles, and for most lifters, it is the cornerstone of their workout. However, a far smaller number of lifters remember the importance of squatting in their weekly routines. Both exercises are essential for total body strength and power. However, it is important to first practice the correct technique of each exercise and to know the importance of including these two moves into your lifting regimen.

BENCH PRESS

The bench press is the primary exercise for building strength and power in the muscles of the pectoral girdle. These muscles include pectoralis major and minor, deltoid, triceps brachii and rotator-cuff muscles.

When performing the bench press, start by lying flat on the bench with your feet planted firmly on the ground. Point your toes at a 45-degree angle away from the midline of your body, and never lift your heels off the ground throughout the entirety of the lift.

Never bring your feet off the ground or place them on the bench, especially under heavier weights, as this could cause you to lose your balance and drop the bar, possibly resulting in an injury to yourself or those nearby.

Also, never take your back off the bench at any point during the lift. Doing so could be harmful to your back and spine.

Start the lift by slowly unracking the bar. Ask a friend or weight room attendant for a "lift-off" and spot if the weight is too heavy to easily manage yourself.

Begin slowly lowering the bar to the crest, or nipple-line, of your chest. This is called the eccentric phase of the lift as the muscles involved in the lift lengthen as you lower the bar.

Take at least two seconds to lower the bar completely to your chest.

Never bounce the bar off your chest at the bottom of the lift, because this could damage your sternum, ribs or pectoralis muscles.

Immediately bring the bar back up in a controlled movement after it touches your chest. Take at least one second to complete the concentric, or contracting, phase of the lift.

Once you have finished the lift and returned the bar to its starting position,

Women increase lean muscle with weight training

Attention women: Why are we told over and over about the abundant benefits weight lifting provides, but we still cling to a lingering hesitation to commit to it?

MELISSA HAUG

Women have numerous misconceptions about weight training. Perhaps you've used one in the past as your excuse to avoid the "big boy" weight room. Maybe you don't want to get too bulky, or perhaps you believe if you start and then stop later, the muscle will turn to fat.

Sorry, women. It's time to stop worrying about building bulk and start concentrating on preventing injuries and potential diseases in the future, while improving strength and tone today.

According to the American Council on Exercise, when men and women are exposed to the same strength training program, men generally will hypertrophy (an increase in the size of myofibrils inside muscle fibers) to a greater extent than women. The key contributing factor to this phenomenon is the higher levels of the hormone testosterone men possess. Simply put, women can no longer use "getting too bulky" as an excuse.

For some of you, it's understandable that you live in fear of muscle, especially when the quality of your day is determined by the number your scale shows each morning.

Although it might be discouraging to see the numbers barely drop when beginning a weight program, you must remember you are undergoing a change in body composition.

By maintaining a cardiovascular exercise routine while including a weight-lifting program, you will ensure muscle does not develop on top of the fat. Instead, as the fat cells decrease (or are used up as a source of energy) during exercise, your lean muscle mass will increase. This, in turn, will speed up your metabolism, resulting in less flab and more tone.

As your body transforms, not only will you increase how quickly you can burn calories, but also you will improve your overall appearance, which helps boost self-confidence and reduce stress.

If the scale fails to show your progress in numbers, check your headway by observing how loose your clothes begin to feel. You might feel more confident in the weight room if you bring a friend along to do your workout routine. That way

Defensive back Baldwin out for season

By Nick Dunn
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State football team will be without starting defensive back Bryan Baldwin for the remainder of the season, coach Ron Prince said Tuesday.

Prince said the junior cornerback was injured during the game against Louisville, but said he would not reveal the nature of the injury until all the information is clear.

Replacing Baldwin on the depth chart is junior Byron Garvin, who has seen a lot of action so far this season as a nickle back. True freshman Joshua Moore now will get the chance to fill in for Garvin.

"Obviously (Baldwin) had a very good start to the season," Prince said. "He had become a very big part of how we played on defense. I expect him to make a full recovery in time for the spring."

Baldwin had 10 tackles in his four starts this season and had one interception, which he returned 21 yards in the win over Marshall on Sept. 16.

"Since Baldwin went down, that's why we have a lot of depth," Moore said. "The next person has to stand up – no slack."

COVERING THE SPREAD

The loss of a starting defensive back will hurt even more when K-State travels to Waco, Texas, Saturday to face Baylor's pass-happy, spread offense.

Baylor enters the contest with a 1-3 record after losing 27-20 in overtime at home to Army last week.

"Of all the teams that I've looked at, (Baylor) has as fascinating offensive firepower as any team we've seen so far in the young season," Prince said.

The Bears are led by quarterback Shawn Bell, who has thrown for 1,071 yards and seven touchdowns while connecting on more than 66 percent of his passes.

K-State has not won its Big 12 opener since 2000, when it posted a 44-21 win at Colorado. The game in Waco will be the eighth-straight season the Wildcats open conference

Volleyball looks to snap losing streak

By Jeffrey Rake
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's volleyball team will look to snap a four-match losing streak as it takes on Iowa State at 7 tonight at Ahearn Field House.

The Wildcats (8-5, 0-3 Big 12) have lost all three of their Big 12 Conference games this season, including a five-game loss Friday night at Texas A&M.

If the Wildcats hope to break their losing streak tonight, history is on their side. They have defeated the Cyclones (9-4, 1-2 Big 12) the last 20 meetings, with 15 of those matches being 3-0 sweeps.

K-State vs. Iowa State
When: 7 tonight
Where: Ahearn Field House
Radio: The match will be tape-delayed to 10 p.m. on 1350 KMAN
Internet: Live stats will be available at www.kstatesports.com

Coach Suzie Fritz said Iowa State is not a team the Wildcats will take lightly, and the Cyclones have several talented players who can create some problems for K-State. One of those players is junior middle blocker Erin Boeve, who has 137 kills on the season and averages 1.73 blocks per game.

"They've got two good outside hitters, and they are going to set Boeve a lot, and she's an exceptional blocker," Fritz said. "The key for us will be controlling their outsides and making sure Boeve doesn't get away from us."

Tonight's game might be the best opportunity the Wildcats have to end their current skid, because after Iowa State, their schedule is tough. They will face No. 8-ranked Texas at noon on Saturday and No. 1 Nebraska on Oct. 4.

Sophomore outside hitter Jenny Jantsch said her team needs a win and will do anything to get it.

Of all the players on the Wildcats' roster, nobody has played more games against the Cyclones than lone senior outside hitter Sandy Werner.

Werner has never lost to the Cyclones, but said she still expects a competitive match.

"Iowa State is a very scrappy team; they will dig a lot of balls," Werner said. "I think they've gotten better each year that I've been here, so I'm sure we can expect that it will be a tough match for us."

re-rack the bar.

SQUAT

Squatting is arguably the most important lift of any strength training regimen because it uses the largest muscle groups of your body: the hamstrings, quadriceps femoris, gluteal muscles and stabilizer muscles throughout your core.

Start with a weight that is not too challenging but will provide some resistance, because perfecting your form is the most important aspect.

With the bar still sitting on the rack, position yourself so the bar sits just behind the crest of your shoulders. Unrack the bar and step back.

During the eccentric phase of the lift, slowly drop your rear to the floor until your thighs are parallel to the ground while keeping your knees behind your toes and your back straight.

Begin the concentric phase of the lift by slowly returning to your starting position. Return the bar to the rack.

When you begin squatting heavier weights, use a lifting belt to protect your back and abdominal muscles.

Weight lifting is the one activity that can benefit people of all ages and both genders. It decreases one's risk for obesity, diabetes, osteoporosis and heart disease while improving strength and flexibility. In knowing all that, there's no room for excuses. see their 16-year-old want to go out and do it, they want to," she said. "These kids are really bringing in new donors."

Ingalls said she already has visited Chapman High School, where she saw 32 first-time donors give.

The Manhattan High School blood drive will be in November, and Tish Simpson, biology teacher and student council adviser at MHS, said students are getting excited.

Simpson said students were told about the change in the age requirement for blood donors at the high school's student council meeting Wednesday.

"I think there are students who are very ready and willing to give blood," Simpson said.

Take the opportunity to give

- The K-State Blood Drive will be Oct. 3-6. Donations will be at the following times and places:
- 10:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. Oct. 3-5 in the K-State Student Union
- 3-8:30 p.m. Oct. 3-5 in Putnam Hall
- 8:30 a.m. to 2:30 p.m. Oct. 6 in the Union
- Students can donate by walking in or making an appointment by calling 1.800.givelife. Everyone who comes in to donate will receive a free T-shirt.

In the past 10 years of the high school's blood drive, Simpson said the Red Cross has tried to collect about 100 units of usable blood twice each year. With the lowering of the age requirement, Simpson said she thinks the Red Cross probably will ask for about 25 more units, requiring about 150 to be processed to obtain the necessary amount of blood.

Norma Dixon, Flint Hills Red Cross communications director, said she was unsure why the age was changed to 16, but after a group of Kansans lobbied for the change of age, the Red Cross supported it.

Since the American Red Cross was fined $4.2 million in July 2006 for violating blood-safety laws, Dixon said the organization is taking steps to maintain its high standard for safe blood supplies. Dixon said Kansas' law to change the age for blood donors did not correlate to the organization's violations, when the Red Cross had to recall, from 2003 to 2005, about 12,000 units of blood and blood products that had not been properly tested before distribution.

"It hasn't affected donations, and we are hoping it doesn't," Dixon said.

About every two seconds, someone in the United States needs blood, according to the American Red Cross blood donor Web site, givelife.org. Nationally, Dixon said only about 5 percent of U.S. citizens eligible to donate blood actually do. Dixon said Kansas usually falls a little below average.

The change in the age requirement is beneficial for the Red Cross and those needing blood, Dixon said.

"It is a really big change for us to be able to do this," she said. "It's a positive change for us to do this because we get more donations."

Commissioner Tom Phillips agreed.

"Thank you for fulfilling the commitment you made to the public," he said. "It's very rewarding to be in a community where intergovernmental relationships exist. It serves the public well."

Board member Randy Briarwood addressed the commissioners. He said they easily could have dismissed the board's plea as an inappropriate way to use the sales tax.

Mayor Bruce Snead also lauded the board for carrying the issue to the voters to pass the increase, particularly in light of the 300 additional students who have entered the district since September.

The motion passed to a second hearing with a vote of 5-0.

The Wildcats are 5-0 all-time against Baylor.

DEPTH CHART CHANGES

A number of moves occurred on K-State's depth chart this week.

After missing last week's game, center Jordan Bedore will return to his starting role. Against Louisville, junior Jacob Voegeli filled in for the injured Bedore on the offensive line.

Defensive tackle Quintin Echols will make his first start of the season, jumping ahead of Steven Cline. Echols started all 11 games a season ago and already has posted 14 tackles off the bench this season.

Safety Marcus Watts also will make his return as a starter for the first time this season.

NORWOOD'S BACK

After sitting one game due to suspension, tight end Rashaad Norwood is back as one of the starters on the depth chart.

Prince said he's not ready to name Norwood the starter for sure, but he definitely will play in Saturday's game.

"We'll see how the practices go," he said. "We've got a pretty competitive situation at the tight end position; we'll see who starts at tight end. Right now, if we were to go out in a two tight end set, Rashaad would be out there."

Agronomy department marks 100 years

By Adrianne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Department of Agronomy will celebrate 100 years this week with a series of events today through Saturday.

Founded in 1906, the agronomy department "provides statewide leadership for teaching, research and extension activities in plant breeding, crop production, range science, soil science and weed sciences," according to the department's Web site.

Agronomy is defined as a "branch of agriculture dealing with field-crop production and soil management," according to the Future Harvest Centers' Web site.

Preparations for events have been in progress for a year, said Gary Pierzynski, professor and interim head of the agronomy department.

CENTENNIAL STARTING SEMINAR

When: 3:30-5 p.m. today
Where: Throckmorton 1018
Who: George Ham, former head of the agronomy department, associate dean and director of K-State Research and Extension and interim dean of College of Agriculture

Ham will present his seminar titled "One Hundred Years of Agronomy at K-State."

"The centennial committee selected him (Ham) because we thought he'd be good since he knows a lot about the history of the department," said Gerry Posler, professor of agronomy and co-chair of the committee.

AGRONOMY CENTENNIAL PROCLAMATIONS, LECTURE

When: 3:30 p.m. (proclamations) and 4 p.m. (lecture) Friday
Where: Throckmorton 1018
Who: Surajit K. De Datta, associate provost for International Affairs, director of the Office of International Research, Education and Development at Virginia Tech and former head of the Department of Agronomy at the International Rice Research Institute in the Philippines

De Datta's lecture is titled "Food, Environment and the Livelihood Security in the Global Context."

He was selected as a lecturer to provide a national and international perspective on agronomy's effect in the world, said Charles Rice, professor of soil microbiology and director of Consortium for Agricultural Soils Mitigation of Greenhouse Gases.

"I think it's really an opportunity for students and other faculty to hear about agronomy's impact in feeding people," Rice said. "Food security is an issue in today's world, and for students, it makes them more globally aware about issues."

FIELD DAY

When: 9 a.m. to noon Saturday
Where: North Farm, 2200 Kimball Ave. A complimentary lunch will be offered at 2200 Kimball Ave. from noon to 1 p.m.

"Field day will be a discussion and description of how things have changed over the 100 years that we've been in the department," Posler said.

OPEN HOUSE

When: 1-3 p.m. Saturday
Where: Throckmorton Hall

The open house will feature a crop biotechnology lab where people can perform DNA-extraction from a wheat plant, Posler said. It also will showcase past scholarship winners, department heads and faculty awards, he said.

K-State students in the Wheat State Agronomy Club will talk about their presentations from the Students of Agronomy, Soils and Environmental Sciences national conference, said Cammie Feldt, senior in agronomy and president of the Wheat State Agronomy Club.

"It's a great way to meet and catch up with alumni," Feldt said of the centennial events.

HISTORY OF RANGE RESEARCH

When: 3-4:30 p.m. Saturday
Where: Rannells Flint Hills Prairie Preserve, 845 Deep Creek Road

The history of range research will feature facilities that relate to global climate change and beef cattle research on the grasslands at Rannells Flint Hills Prairie Preserve, Posler said.

RECEPTION AND BANQUET

When: 5:30 p.m. Saturday
Where: K-State Alumni Center
Tickets for the banquet are $30. For more information, contact Dana Minihan at (785) 532-7258.

The reception and banquet will feature students, alumni, faculty and friends who have been vital to the agronomy department in its first 100 years, according to the agronomy department's Web site.

A golf tournament was originally scheduled for Sept. 29, but it was canceled due to lack of interest, Pierzynski said.

Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., sponsored a resolution to commend the agronomy department.

The resolution received unanimous consent from the U.S. Senate on Friday. Brownback graduated from K-State with a bachelor's degree in agricultural economics in 1979.

"I am happy that my colleagues in the Senate have recognized the important role of the Department of Agronomy at Kansas State University," Brownback said in a news release. "For 100 years, the Department of Agronomy at Kansas State has provided excellent training."

More than half of the faculty members in the agronomy department have received at least one national recognition or award, Pierzynski said.

The department also is second in the College of Agriculture and fourth university-wide for its research expenditures, Pierzynski said.

"I think it's a good opportunity to learn about where your food comes from and some of the contributions K-State has made in that regard," Pierzynski said of the events.

"He was just kind of floating in the water face-down," Wessel said.

"At first, people thought he was adjusting to the coldness of the water, but when they realized something was wrong, a couple of his frat brothers pulled him out of the water."

Short was responsive before the ambulance arrived but had lost feeling in his legs and fingers, Wessel said.

He was taken to Mercy Regional Health Center and then transferred by helicopter to Via Christi Medical Center in Wichita.

Short had broken his vertebrae and bruised his spinal cord.

Wessel said after Short's surgery Sunday night, the neurosurgeon told Short's family that everything went smoothly, and Short received no further damage from his removal from the water, which can be difficult to avoid with spinal cord injuries.

The swelling of Short's spinal cord is the cause of temporary paralysis in his legs and fingers, Wessel said.

Nurses told the family the swelling should go down, and Short should regain feeling in seven to 10 days.

After the swelling diminishes, Short will be able to begin rehabilitation.

Wessel said the family does not have an estimate as to how long Short will be in rehabilitation, but relatives have been assured that Short should have a quick recovery.

"Everybody is confident in how everything is going to turn out," Wessel said. "The main thing is we have to wait and see what happens within this next week."

Secretary of education backs ideas to simplify college choices

By Ben Feller
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON – Education Secretary Margaret Spellings launched plans Tuesday to redefine the college experience, promising less confusion and more results for families.

Spellings said she would make a handful of changes on her own and start building support for some of the more sweeping ideas that came from her higher education commission.

Chief among them is the creation of a massive information-sharing system, opening up greater review of how colleges and universities are performing. It would require vast data collection on individual students, already raising privacy concerns in some corners.

Spellings also pledged to make it easier for people to apply for financial aid and to compare the price and the value of one school to another. She spoke of more federal college aid but would not endorse a specific request to raise Pell Grants, as her commission wanted.

Sensitive to how colleges would respond to her plans, Spellings heaped praise on them. Then she mocked the idea that everything is fine.

"Is it fine that college tuition has outpaced inflation?" she asked. "Is it fine that only half our students graduate on time? Is it fine that students often graduate so saddled with debt that they can't buy a home or start a family? None of this seems fine to me."

Bringing Sexy Back

Justin Timberlake's latest album raises pop-music bar with seductive ballads layered over excellent production

"FutureSex/LoveSounds"

Grade: B+

Music review by Mark Sibilla

It has been made known: I am an avid fan of Justin Timberlake's new album "FutureSex/LoveSounds."

So let the backlash begin. I expect it to come from many sources: Collegian readers who think I'm a hack, my friends who wouldn't be caught dead with a copy of the album, and even from my younger sister, who I have made listen to the album countless times.

As a music reviewer, I endeavor to be as objective as possible, but as a psychology student, I know complete objectivity is impossible, and eventually, subjectivity rears its ugly head.

But try as I might to convince myself otherwise, "FutureSex/LoveSounds" is a success on both the objective and subjective levels.

The album is a pop-music masterpiece. Timberlake and super-producer Timbaland – who produced nearly every track – have made an album full of innovative pop that raises the bar so high every present and future pop star will try for the next few years to match the unparalleled greatness of "FutureSex/LoveSounds."

And subjectively speaking, I simply cannot get enough of this album. I have had it in my CD player every day since its Sept. 12 release. I wish there was a hipster confessional where I could go to be forgiven for its guilty pleasures.

"I am sorry, Father, for I have sinned. I just can't stop loving Justin Timberlake."

Then I would recite the lyrics to Neutral Milk Hotel's "Oh Comely" three times and listen to "Future Days" by Can, and my wrongs would be absolved.

But alas, this is not the case. Thus I am forever shunned for listening to this album.

But enough self-pity. Now is the time in the review when I will begin gushing.

It begins with the title track in which Timbaland uses what sounds like the bass line from Queen's "Another One Bites the Dust." But this isn't a bastardization of a classic riff like the fiasco regarding Vanilla Ice's "Ice Ice Baby." No, Timbaland uses the basic template of the riff and re-imagines the rest into a sleek hook.

But as seen on Nelly Furtado's "Loose," excellent production won't support an album when the star has no mystique. However, Timberlake more than holds up his end of the bargain by never allowing himself to be overpowered by the production and constantly adapting to the twists and turns of Timbaland's beats.

Timberlake seductively coos and purrs lines like, "Slide a little bit closer little girl/'Cause daddy's on a mission to please," without sounding perverted or ridiculous.

Courtesy Art

Timberlake sounds suave and confident on every track of the album. "SexyBack" finds Timberlake's distorted falsetto smoothly riding Timbaland's bouncy synths and declaring that every man watches his woman, because JT will make the girls "burn it up for (him) – and that's a fact." I especially like the goofy voice that proclaims "Take 'em to the chorus." It is reminiscent of something straight from a track by Parliament/Funkadelic, and it is a perfect example of Timberlake (successfully) pushing his musical bounds.

"Sexy Ladies" has a rubbery bass line over which Timberlake brags about his skills that allow him access to the "sexy ladies all over the floor." The song has a short prelude, "Let Me Talk to You," that leads into the amazing second single "My Love." Over jittery synth lines that rise and fall, crescendo and decrescendo, Timberlake makes proclamations about his love and devotion that would have even me swooning over his sensuous come-ons.

Another album highlight is the beautifully melodic "What Goes Around... Comes Around." It is equal to Timberlake's previous hit "Cry Me a River." Timberlake sadly and bitterly rejects a cheating partner who discovers her lover won't return her phone calls. It is the song of an alienated lover painfully dismissing his unfaithful significant other.

There are hardly any missteps on "FutureSex/LoveSounds," except for an embarrassing appearance by Three 6 Mafia in "Chop Me Up" and a song sympathizing with a crack addict who has lost everything. It is ambitious, but ultimately doesn't work.

Scoff all you want at my adoration of Justin Timberlake, but whatever you do, don't stand in my way as I hail "The New King of Pop."

CBS producers discuss new drama based in fictional Kansas town

Staff reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"Jericho" is a new drama about how residents in a small, peaceful Kansas town respond to a nuclear explosion that appears on the horizon. Left completely isolated, they wonder if they are the only people left alive. The show, which debuted last week, airs 7 p.m. Wednesdays on CBS.

In the premiere episode, Jake Green (Skeet Ulrich) returns to his fictional hometown of Jericho, Kan., after a long absence to claim money his grandfather left him. Secretly hiding where he has been for the past five years, Jake dodges questions about his whereabouts. In his attempt to return to San Diego, Jake witnesses a nuclear explosion; the event, which drastically changes his life, also dramatically alters the lives of those around him. Jericho now faces a crisis. People are paranoid, and well-kept secrets are no longer. The people of Jericho soon realize who their true friends are.

In tonight's episode, "Fallout," Jake must improvise when he finds the official shelter unusable just an hour before fallout from the nuclear blast is to hit the town.

Executive producers Carol Barbee, Stephen Chbosky and Jon Turteltaub share their insights on the new "Jericho" series via online interview. Viewers can access this interview on the CBS Web site at www.cbs.com/primetime/jericho.

Q. How would you describe "Jericho?"

Turteltaub: Jericho really asks that question of what would happen if nuclear bombs went off near us in America, around us. How we would survive. Are we ready? Are we prepared? Those are the big issues, but the real issues in the show are smaller than that on an individual level. What do you do when you're faced with fear and panic, and what do you do when your life is in your own hands, when the people you love and you care about are the people you are responsible for. And there is no one else there. You have to make your own choices in life

Chbosky: One of the fundamental things about the show is that we wanted to have it to feel real, to have a reality base. The thing about real life is often just the word "real." People think gritty or they think dark. Or they think, you know, it's always that side of it. When you think about real life, there is humor in about anything. People make jokes on the darkest day of their lives. It's how we cope, and so hence, humor is going to be a big part of Jericho just because it's a big part of their lives.

Q. What is "Jericho" going to offer viewers compared to other shows out there today?

Barbee: We're very excited about the digital story line. We are going to tell one discrete story that only lives online that then will dub tell with the story we have on screen. And we will find certain points where that will happen, and people who pay close attention will see things on the digital story line that they will see in the on-screen story, and they will understand there is a connection there.

Beach Museum displays latest renovations

A newly constructed conference room that can hold up to 12 people is inside the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art. The administrative staff was moved out of their offices, while two offices were transformed into the new room.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art showed off some newly renovated space at an open house Wednesday.

This was the first of two open houses; the other will be from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. today. The museum will show its new office and storage space, as well as the library and a conference room, all located in the lower main level.

Martha Scott, administrative officer of the museum, said the museum staff knew more space would be needed last year.

"We ran out of storage space," Scott said.

The renovations, which began in November 2005, are halfway complete, and the staff wanted to show the progress to the public.

"We thought it would be fun to see the new rooms," said Colina Stanton, health professions adviser and one of Wednesday's visitors. "We've seen the gallery before, and we're excited about the new space."

The project will cost $4.9 million and is covered through funds from the KSU Foundation and funds raised over the past few years, Scott said.

Christian rock band Disciple to play Wareham tonight

By Jesse Sachdeva
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Nationally known Christian rock band Disciple will headline a concert tonight in the Wareham Opera House, 410 Poyntz Ave.

Hailing from Knoxville, Tenn., Disciple has garnered six number-one hits in its 10-year existence. The band has made a name for itself in the Christian rock community, and has been nominated for four Dove awards, including Best Hard Rock Song and Album of the Year.

Jason Grogan, director of youth ministries at First United Methodist Church, helped organize the concert.

"We began planning the concert in late May," Grogan said. "I worked with several youth pastors in town and Manhattan Christian College to organize the concert. We didn't really have any corporate sponsors besides the [First United Methodist] Church."

Opening the show will be two bands Grogan described as "up and coming" on the Christian rock scene, Grand Prize and Red. According to its official Web site, Grand Prize released its debut album in January 2005. Its sound has been compared with that of popular Christian-turned-mainstream band, Switchfoot. Grogan described the other opener, Red, as "a hard-hitting, Christian metal group."

Kansas sees 60 cent decrease, but consumers are uncertain it will stay low

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When gas prices started falling in September, the company Scott Mainville works for took a sigh of relief.

"There was totally rejoicement to that," said Mainville, operational officer for Double CC Delivery in Manhattan.

After having to tag additional expenses onto customers' bills this year to cover the increased cost of driving across the country, the company has been able to loosen its belt and give customers a better rate, Mainville said.

The average price of gas in Kansas on Wednesday was $2.129, according to www.kansasgasprices.com, more than a 60-cent decrease from Kansas' average last month of $2.756. The Web site reported the average price of gas in the United States on Wednesday was $2.361, about 46 cents less than the average last month of $2.824.

Despite the rapid decline in gas prices, some remain skeptical of two things – how low and how long.

"I wish I could say it's coming down as fast as it went up," Mainville said.

Michael Babcock, professor of economics, said several components probably have influenced lower gas prices, including less truck traffic and a slowing economy.

"Demand is down because people reacted to the price being high," he said. "Also, once you get out of the summer, the amount of driving is significantly decreased."

The supply of gas also has been comparatively strong in recent months, Babcock said.

"We haven't had any major crises in countries in the Middle East, and we haven't had any hurricanes tear up St. Louis," he said. "You put all of that together, and you get lower prices."

While there is talk of prices continuing to fall and staying low, Babcock said he is skeptical.

"I just don't see that happening, because if you have 99-cent gas, demand goes up, and the oil producers turn back up," he said. "I just don't see it happening."

In future months, Mainville said he thought the price would initially continue to fall and pick up early next year.

But Mainville said in his opinion, the days of 99-cent gas are over.

"I really don't think we'll ever see it less than $1.75," he said. "I think that is the lowest I'll see it."

Mainville said paying for diesel fuel, which most of Double CC Delivery's trucks use, has been the biggest cost effect for business.

"People don't want to ship stuff if they have to pay more for fuel," he said. "All your local stores felt the crunch of it going up."

The increased price of gas affects whoever is shipping items, Mainville said, including a necessary surcharge that gets added to many of the shipping deliveries.

Mary Gonzales, AAA district office supervisor in the Manhattan area, said a lower price for gas has made traveling easier for many of her clients.

"I think it's a great thing, not only for travelers, but also for the economy in general," she said.

After gas prices reached more than $3 per gallon during the summer, Gonzales said AAA tried to combat decreased travel by incorporating an advertising campaign called "One-tank trips." She said the summer advertisement listed destinations people could take on one tank of gas.

Despite the high gas prices, Gonzales said people have been determined to make the best of the economic strain it has put on their wallets.

"They're not going to let it deteriorate their family outings," she said.

As prices fall, Gonzales said people need to take advantage of the change in the market, while keeping the big picture in mind.

"The decrease in fuel prices is astounding, but I think people need to look at the whole aspect," she said. "Let's not overindulge in that reduction."

Male-female student ratio remains unequal

By Megan Molitor
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The total number of female students on K-State's campus has increased by almost 900, according to a planning and analysis report.

The report says 10,945 women were enrolled in 2001, which increased to 11,832 women in 2005. In comparison, male enrollment, which was at 11,451 in 2001, decreased to 11,350 in 2005.

Angela Hubler, director of Women's Studies, said the higher enrollment reflects the fact that significantly more women than men are enrolled at a graduate level.

"Overall enrollments are highest in graduate programs with the historically highest enrollments of women," Hubler said.

There are more women in graduate Arts and Sciences and Education programs.

"Unlike national trends, however, men continue to outnumber women at the undergraduate level, 9,574 to 9,264," Hubler said.

She said the undergraduate gap exists because some colleges at K-State, like the College of Agriculture and the College of Veterinary Medicine, still enroll more men than women.

"This is a continuing cause of concern because these traditionally male professions are much more highly paid than those in which women are better represented," Hubler said.

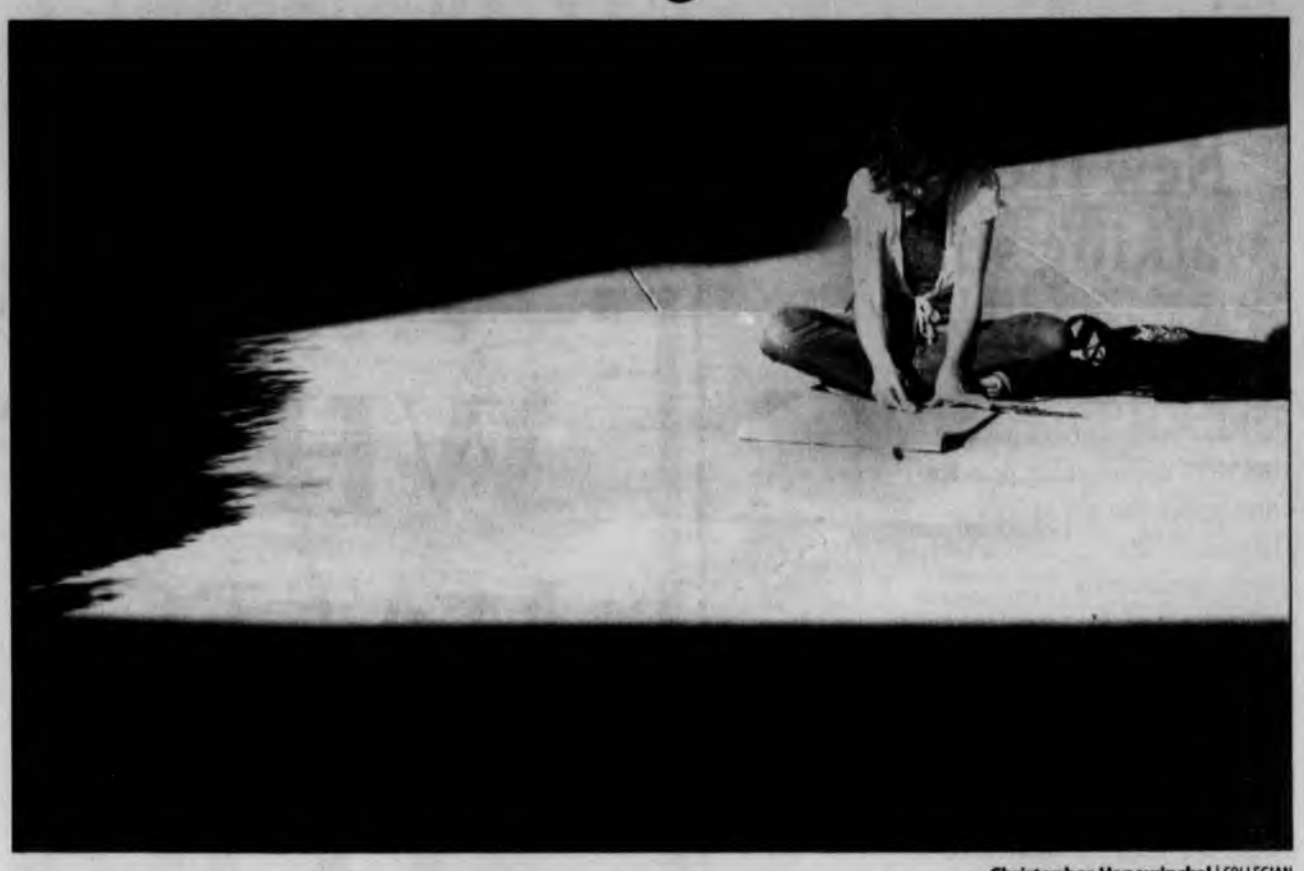
However, Hubler said this economic gap is motivating more women to seek a higher education, since women continue to earn only 77 percent of men's earnings. She said women feel a greater need to pursue this education because they need a higher level of education to earn as much as men with a lower level of education.

"In 2005, women with a master's degree earned less than men with a bachelor's degree," Hubler said. "Clearly, equity continues to elude women."

Many students have noticed the greater number of women not only on campus, but also in individual classes.

"There's mostly girls in my classes, but a lot of that probably has to do with my major," Katie Imel, senior in secondary education, said. "Especially in my Spanish and English classes, I notice it a lot more."

Imel is a member of the marching band and said she thinks there are more women in that organization, too.



"In some parts of campus, I don't believe women are represented well yet," she said. "There are many more fraternities than sororities, and men's sports are much more focused on."

Imel said the biggest disadvantage of enrolling more women at K-State could be increased competition for men, but she looks forward to more organizations for women.

Women aren't the only ones with opinions on the matter, and some think women share equal roles on campus.

"I think that both sexes are represented well," Nathaniel Grote, junior in music education, said. "There's definitely advantages to having more women here. There would be a lot more girls to check out."

TO THE POINT

New fuels, walking still necessary

A matter of weeks ago, the nation was furious about gas prices that were approaching post-Katrina levels. But the price at the pump significantly has decreased in recent weeks, and concerns about future prices are easing.

TO THE PIONT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

But we should not let ourselves forget the need for alternative forms of transportation and alternative fuels. When prices were high, students were riding bikes, walking, and buying more fuel efficient modes of transportation.

Gas prices returning to about $2 per gallon is not a reason to increase wasteful driving or cease walking to class. Only through pure determination can we ween ourselves from our oil needs, and continuing to cut back on driving for unnecessary reasons is one way to do that.

We also cannot allow ourselves to forget about the need for alternative fuels. When gas prices were high, Americans were clamoring for newer, cleaner fuels. Gas being more affordable doesn't mean we should turn our back on ethanol or hybrid cars.

So keep walking when it's nice outside; keep riding your bike when you're in a hurry; and keep telling your lawmakers to vote for new fuels. Wasteful driving is a bad idea, whether gas is $2 per gallon, or $5.

Columnist shows just how bad popular author's examples really are

GRANT REICHERT

What's the matter with Kansas?

Any serious discussion of this topic should begin with "old people," and end with "period." When Kansas' main export is its youth and the median age is hovering somewhere around "eminent death," you know something is amiss.

I can't even go back to my hometown anymore. The lifeless streets, the moaning, shuffling populace – the whole town looks like a set from a George Romero film, sans brain-eating.

Don't get me wrong, old people are great. Who else could look death straight in the eye every day, and then tell him a rambling anecdote about depression-era grapefruit prices?

We should enact a truce between young and old: they stay out of our stores and places of recreation, and we'll stay out of their graveyards.

However, this isn't likely to happen, as the young have been deluded into voting against their own interest by the aged. The aged are always raising moral non-issues (respect your elders) to distract us from our real material interests: unimpeded Boo Berry purchases.

This bait-and-switch by the elderly is common. Take Thomas Frank, for example – he totally obfuscates the age issue.

What's the matter with Thomas Frank? Just look at his publisher, Henry Holt and Company. Henry Holt founded the company in 1866, which means Holt is more than 140 years old.

True, Frank is only 41 years old.

But, according to a line graph I could have made, this aging trend, if projected into the future, quickly reaches biblical levels.

Freeze frame!

Take a step back. The above is an example of Frankian argument: an impressionistic jumble of personal observations, conspiratorial ruminations on opponents' motives, and vague gestures toward empirical substantiation – all used to demonstrate how material interests are being obscured by irrelevant moral concerns.

To be fair, Frank used real line graphs instead of potential ones at his lecture. When it comes to moral and political issues, though, the only thing line graphs can demonstrate is "this is what pretty mountains look like. Are there any pretty mountain-related questions?"

However, Frank's line graphs only served to turn on the leftist audience, their flaccid worldview momentarily perked into a state of semi-arousal by his crude parody of the whole edifice of free market economic theory. It was a treatment so anti-intellectual it looked like something I might've put together.

In the end, Frank does offer a persuasive case for why Democrats keep losing at the polls – because they listen to ego-strokers like him.

Democrats would do well to stop listening to these nice illusions and accept some real advice: "Don't trust anyone over 30!"

Reopening of stadium gives glimpse of hope

LOLA SHRIMPLIN

In a city where the population, in a comparison by NBC, is close to what it was in 1880 – what with residents not returning after Hurricane Katrina – a remarkable thing is happening.

The Superdome is up and running again.

Anyone who saw the devastation from the hurricane and the way water was pouring through the roof of the stadium had to despair that anything could be done with the building, or the city of New Orleans, for that matter.

Yet a year later, the New Orleans Saints played the Atlanta Falcons and won. The game itself wasn't as important as the statement made by opening the stadium with all sorts of fanfare.

Two major bands performed, yet New Orleans is still under construction. According to NBC news, New Orleans East looks like a war zone.

Built on swamp land after World War II, this part of the city was most vulnerable when the waters came in. The dome was one of the few places of refuge, and when the flood waters rose, it became an island of sorts. Leaky and crowded, but a place of refuge.

When it opened in 1975, it was the world's largest domed stadium, but now it is so much more.

It is a symbol of the American spirit, and of the determination of the people of New Orleans not to fall to adversity.

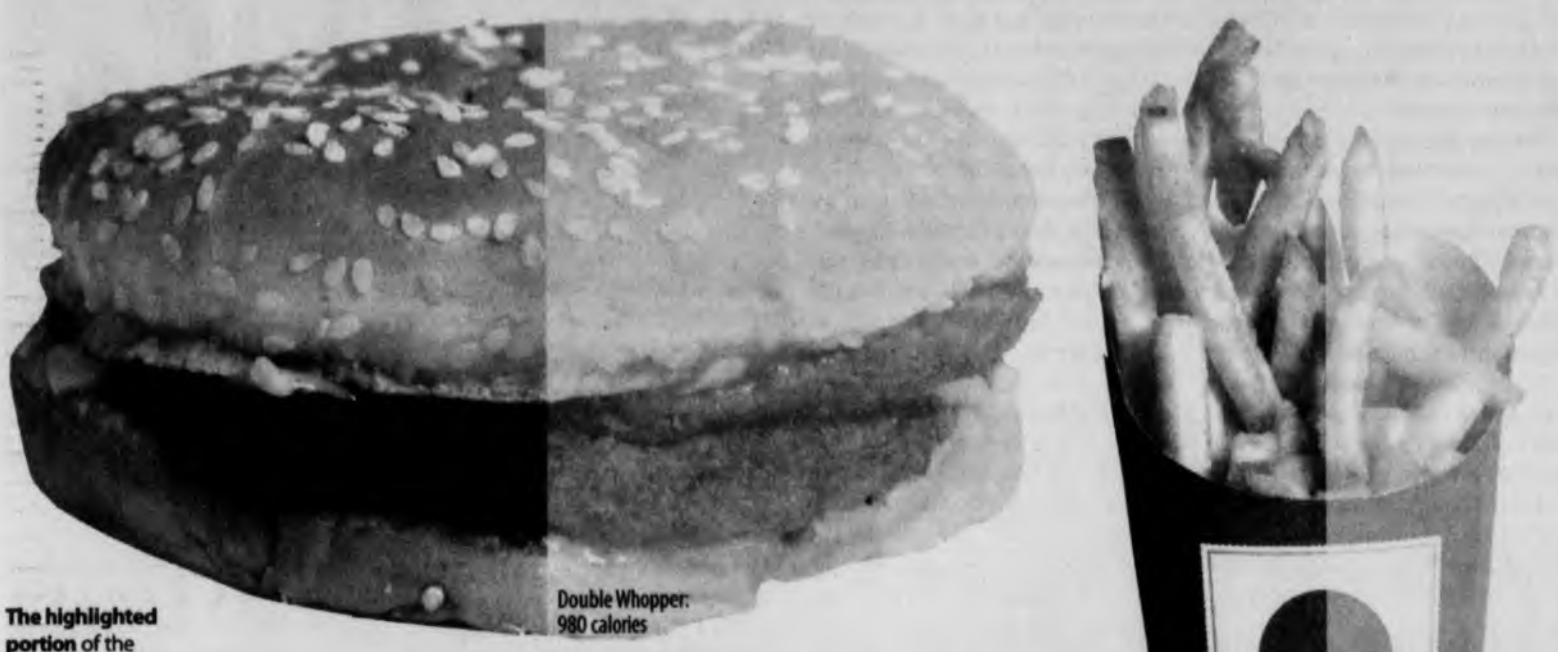
The reopening of the dome brings much-needed funds into a cash-strapped area.

Mary Beth Romig, of the New Orleans Visitors and Convention Bureau, told Business Wire the hotel occupancy was at 85 percent, higher than at Mardi Gras.

Yet there are people in New Orleans who still need help; people who have moved to Houston or other places, whose lives have been utterly destroyed.

The reopening of the dome is a reminder of how far the city has to go. Bands like U2 can play there and bring money into the city, but then they leave, and those who need help are still there waiting.

The dome still remains a symbol for a city that was decimated by a natural disaster and its aftermath.



The people who are living in ruined neighborhoods need something to remind them that their lives are going to get better.

Maybe this is the beginning of the rebuilding of a once-great city.

Like a phoenix from the ashes, New Orleans is rising.

Experts say underestimating calories, reckless eating detrimental to health

By Annette Lawless
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The next time you grab a Big Mac and a soda or a Whopper with fries, you might want to bring along a calculator.

A study in August through the Annals of Internal Medicine concludes that most people, particularly college students, underestimate the number of calories in fast-food meals.

In one part of the study, researchers asked 40 undergraduate students to estimate the calorie content of 15 fast-food meals. The meals consisted of chicken nuggets, French fries and soda, ranging from about 450 to 1,800 calories.

College students participating in the study would overestimate how much they should eat, especially if they were offered larger portion sizes.

"This is not an issue of knowledge, of motivational biases that people want to lie (about what they eat). It's just ingrained perceptual bias that we can't control," stated Pierre Chandon in the report of the two-year study. Chandron is a co-author of the study and assistant professor of marketing at the international business school INSEAD, which is based in France.

Health professionals like Chandron say that because college life is busy, students are likely to overlook their health.

"College students' hours are not always conducive with eating healthy food," said Almaz G. Rufael, dietician and clinical nutrition manager at Mercy Regional Health Center, 1823 College Ave. "When they are on the run and stressed out, they don't always have sound judgment."

Between the late night slushy runs and a quick ice cream treat with friends, the calories add up. Researchers say reckless regard to one's health can lead to long-term risks.

In a 2004 National College Health Risk Behavior Survey, researchers at the American Diabetes Association suggested that as many as 35 percent of college students might be overweight or obese. That percentage increased from a study the year before, concluding 21.6 percent of college students were overweight.

American Diabetes Association researchers stated in their report that in addition to not monitoring one's health, college students lack the metabolism to maintain a healthy lifestyle.

"Maintaining good eating habits is one thing," said Jessica Miller, a Manhattan-area personal trainer, "but if you don't think about exercise in your daily health habits, you are truly throwing away your body."

Miller, a 1999 Oklahoma State University graduate, said when she works with college students, they often lack the motivation to be healthy, let alone exercise.

"Weigh the costs against the benefits," she said. "If you spend 30 minutes a day exercising, even through low-tolerance exercise, you are burning the calories from your soda or hamburger.

"Think about stacking up all the food you ate for one week and not have done any exercise at all. It's just sitting there, but through proper exercise, you can become something better than these statistics. You can be healthy, too."

Quick tips to stay healthy:

- Keep snacks like an apple or a peanut butter and jelly sandwich on hand. Protein bars are good, too.
- Avoid fast food and vending machines.
- Eat slowly. Sit down and enjoy your meal with friends. You should plan at least 30-45 minutes to eat. Your brain needs time to register when you are full.
- Avoid unnecessary add-ins like mayonnaise or dressings. Keep things dry. If you must have them, keep them on the side so you can judge how much you eat.
- Read food labels. It's important to know your food.
- Don't eat late. If you eat high-calorie foods late, you won't have an easy way to burn off the calories.
- Exercise. Healthy eating and exercise will lead to a better lifestyle.
- Plan ahead. Healthy foods like fruits are not expensive. Compared to fast-food alternatives, they are much better for you.

Quick, healthy alternatives available at home

ANNETTE LAWLESS

For the college student on the go, sometimes you don't have time to plan, especially for your meals.

While it's OK to indulge in a little fast-food pleasure, students should avoid the dollar menu and invest in meals that matter.

Even with short breaks between classes, extracurricular activities, work and other more-than-entertaining distractions, the busiest of students can prepare a good meal, and a healthy one, at that.

This semester I am always on the go, but I have never compromised my health (though I'd like to go to the Rec more often) to the point where I would become worried.

Here are a few fast food recipes that don't require a drive-thru menu, and actually are quite inexpensive.

I call them my minute meals on the go.

Women more likely to have replacement hook-ups

LAUREN ROHRER

I have an ex-boyfriend who once got so angry at me that he punched a giant, gaping hole in his wall. It's my thinking that women handle anger a little differently.

Women are clever, and there are things that can sting a man much worse than a hole in the wall. We get hurt, we get mad, and then our gut tells us to get even.

And for me, getting even means tequila shots, martinis and hook-ups. There's nothing available at Home Depot to fix that kind of damage.

Now, for those of you already writing me off as a cheater, hold up.

That's not the kind of getting even I am necessarily referring to – although, I happen to think we're all cheaters in some way or another, and it's not really anyone's place to go around handing out scarlet letters.

I'm talking about getting so hurt, so angry, you feel you have to erase the pain. Doing absolutely everything in your power to forget and replace someone who really meant something with someone else who means absolutely nothing. All the while, holding everything in, until one day you really lose it on some poor guy in line at the ATM. (Yes, it's a true story.)

Replacement hook-ups, or hate sex, happen.

Nothing hits a man's ego like letting him know that he lost the race.

Maybe he finished way too soon.

Maybe he never was a contestant to begin with. Or maybe you just disqualified him based on unsatisfactory performance. No one knows how to make those calls better than a pissed-off female.

Anger and resentment tend to leave us with a false sense of clarity, enabling us to feel like we are in a position to make those calls.

I've had that false sense of clarity; in fact, there's a better name for it: liquor – lots and lots of liquor.

In the Lifetime movie version of this column, this is the part where I confess all my sins, feel really bad, my ex realizes how great I am, we get back together and stay happy forever in the suburbs with a dog or something.

That doesn't happen. Like ever.

While I might feel better for the moment, it's impossible to replace the memory of the replacement hook-up.

And the pain.

The pain of not being with the one you want to be with can really suck. You want to be over it, but you're not.

You want to forget, but you can't.

Most importantly, you want to move on, and that's where you are on your own.

A band-aid can't fix a bullet hole. A replacement hook-up can't fix your heart.

So you sit, and you wait.

And if you are at all religious, pray that something more potent than the mix of tequila, martinis and hook-ups can pull you out.

Or you could always punch a hole in the wall, because as far as I know, that ex-boyfriend is doing quite well.

Rowers build team unity before Oklahoma regatta

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Rowing is an atypical sport. There are no balls, no huge crowds and no individual stars.

Rowing is a team sport. All of the people in the shell have to believe each person is synchronized with the next, or the team will not compete successfully.

"We are all in the boat together, so the only way we are successful is if we are all together with our techniques," senior Kaci Williams said.

Rowing can be a large time commitment for the members. They practice every morning and afternoon, usually devoting more than three hours a day to improving techniques and lowering times on the lake at Tuttle Creek Reservoir or in the rowing practice facilities.

"It is a nasty sport," coach Patrick Sweeney said. "You may want to stop, but you can't. That is why it is a team sport. You learn to trust people."

Sophomore Kari Chadd said achieving perfect timing is not as easy as it might sound. She said the rowing motion might seem simple, but there are several techniques to learn before one becomes a successful rower.

Most of the members of the team have to learn these motions for the first time when they start college. Sweeney said not many schools in the Midwest have rowing teams, so coaches have to look for high school athletes instead of high school rowers.

Sweeney also said the team has existed for fewer than 10 years and has not developed a strong enough reputation to draw actual rowing recruits. Instead, the coaching staff must recruit the most athletic girls from basketball, volleyball and swimming teams, as well as other sport teams.

Chadd said the assistant rowing coach sent an e-mail to her high school basketball coach looking for tall girls interested in rowing.

"I played sports in high school and liked it a lot, but rowing was new, and I thought that I would not get burned out like with basketball or volleyball," Chadd said.

But several females, like Williams, have walked on to the rowing team.

"I really just wanted to check it out, so I went into the meeting, saw how they were trying to make it bigger and decided to join," Williams said.

Sweeney said it usually takes girls a year to learn most of the aspects of rowing. The women are red-shirted their first year and then are asked to contribute in their second year.

Many of the older members of the team help coach Sweeney, and the assistant coaches make the learning curve a little less steep.

"We have been there before, so we can kind of help out," Williams said. "We let them know that it sucks, and it is hard, but it will be worth it in the end."

Not only do the team members learn to trust each other, they also learn to be friends. Williams said the women on the rowing teams usually spend as much time together out of practice as in practice. Many of them become best friends and even live together.

Since Sweeney was hired as coach, the rowing team has made significant improvements in ability and results. Last year, the team finished tied for seventh place at Central/South NCAA regional. It was the best finish by a K-State rowing team at a regional qualifying event.

"We are heading to places we have never been before," Williams said. "We have improved a lot over every year, and the girls are willing to put in the effort to improve."

The rowing team will compete in its first event of the semester on Saturday. The team will travel to Oklahoma City for the Head of the Oklahoma Regatta, a two-day competition that includes Louisville, Kansas and Texas.

Junior Alexis Johnson, sophomore Jennifer Flannigan, junior Bjai Rice and the other members of the women's rowing team will participate in their first meet of the season Saturday at the Head of the Oklahoma Regatta in Oklahoma City.

Believe it, Madden curse exists

CEDRIQUE FLEMMING

I have tried hard for many years not to believe it, but the Madden curse exists.

Hall of fame coach and current football analyst John Madden created a video game in 1989 for the National Football League, appropriately named Madden Football. He was on the cover of the Electronic Arts (EA) Sports game for every edition until the game began using players in 2000.

Every year since then, the cover boy has suffered some sort of injury or seen a huge drop in his productivity, thus creating the dreaded Madden Curse.

This year is starting to look like déjà vu. Shaun Alexander, running back for the Seattle Seahawks, won the Most Valuable Player award last year and graces the cover of the 2007 edition.

After breaking his left foot in a 42-30 victory over the New York Giants last week, Alexander has been relegated to just another player who fell victim to "The Curse."

Even before the injury, his production for the first three weeks was less than what most would have expected of the 2005 MVP.

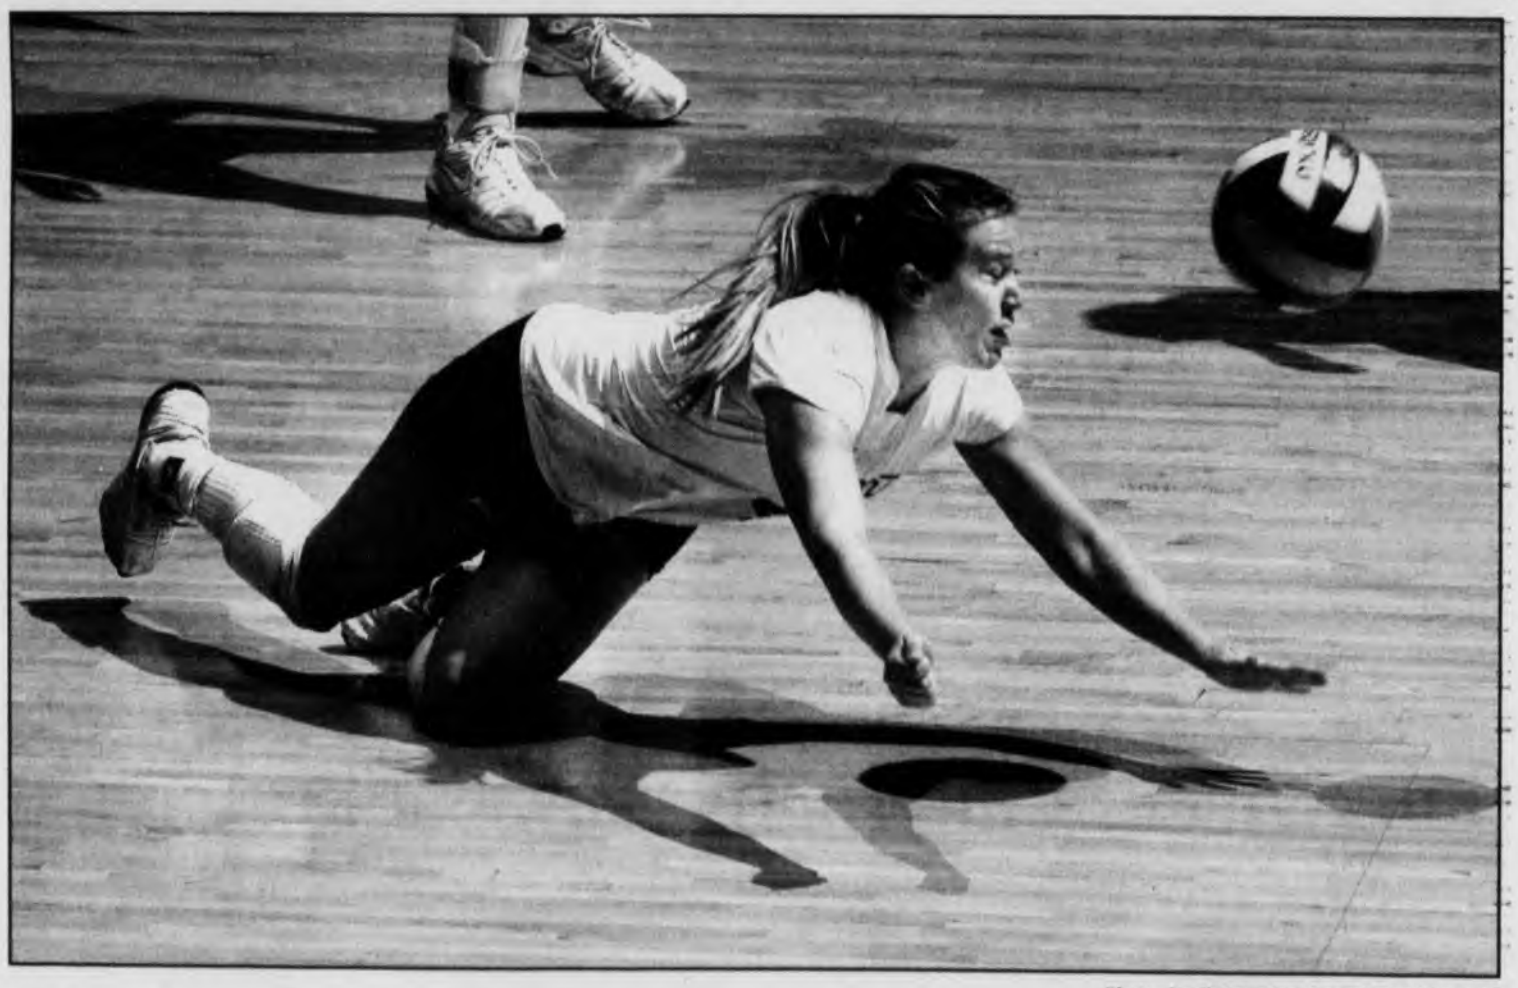
So far this season, he has just 187 yards and two touchdowns in three games. He has gained less than 100 yards in each of Seattle's three games this season, his first such streak in two years.

Here are all of the players and a little about what happened the season they were on the Madden cover.

■ Shaun Alexander – 2007 cover, 2006 season.

He suffered a broken foot in the third game of the season and will miss at least two games. He rushed for a career-high 1,880 yards and broke the record for most rushing touchdowns in a season (27) last year.

■ Donovan McNabb – 2006 cover, 2005 season



Who remembers the highly publicized feud he and problem-child wide receiver Terrell Owens went through? Owens was kicked off the team and now plays for the Dallas Cowboys. McNabb, the Philadelphia Eagles' quarterback, suffered a sports hernia in the opening game of the regular season. He refused to have the required surgery, and was

K-State's losing streak reaches 5 matches with loss to Iowa State, their first loss to the Cyclones in 20 matches

By Jeffrey Rake
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's volleyball team could not rely on one streak to snap another.

K-State (8-6, 0-4 Big 12) had beaten Iowa State 20 straight times, and was hopeful to continue that streak, and snap its four-match losing streak.

Instead, they lost 2-3 (19-30, 30-21, 31-29, 26-30, 11-15) and are now 0-4 in the Big 12 Conference.

It is the Wildcats' worst start to conference play since 1993, when they lost every match in what was formerly the Big 8 Conference.

Coming into the match, coach Suzie Fritz expressed concern over Cyclone junior middle blocker Erin Boeve; saying she felt Boeve could give her team problems along the net.

Boeve gave a solid performance, totaling 22 kills along with a .375 hitting percentage.

However, Fritz said it was the play of Boeve's teammates that hurt K-State.

"Boeve is going to get her kills; you are not going to stop her," Fritz said.

"But what we needed to do was stop somebody else ... we just let too many people get away from us."

The Wildcats were led by senior outside hitter Sandy Werner and redshirt freshman middle blocker Megan Kroeker, who combined for 34 kills.

Junior libero Angie Lastra had 17 digs, which put her in a tie for third on the all-time K-State digs list at 1,258 with former Wildcat Dawn Cady.

The Wildcats were unable to close the door on the Cyclones when they had the chance in the fourth game.

K-State was leading 19-13 and was in position to finish off the Cyclones.

But Iowa State scored five straight points to pull within 19-18, before taking the game 26-30.

"We had actually been doing a good job of not letting up straight points," sophomore outside hitter Jenny Jantsch said.

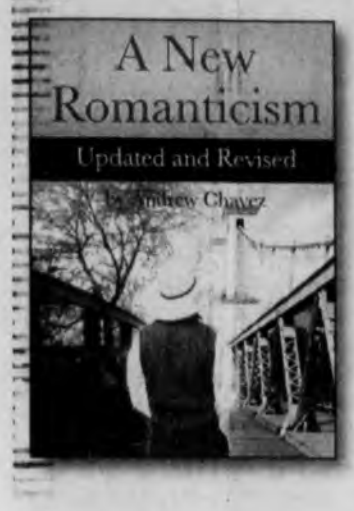
"We let them get on five-point runs ... and it's just crushing."

The Cyclones trailed 9-8 in the fifth and final game before going on a 7-2 run to close out the match, 11-15.

Werner said her team was unable to capitalize on the opportunities they had.

"It comes down to keeping constant pressure on them and being able to make the little plays," Werner said.

Fritz had a different theory.



When asked what the missing ingredient with her team was, Fritz said, "heart."

The Wildcats have the next two days off and will have to wait until Saturday for a chance at their first conference win of the season, when they travel to take on No. 8 Texas.

K-State alum self-publishes updated book on new romanticism

By Megan Moser
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Can you have a new idea based on going back to the old?

One K-State alumnus and author thinks so.

Andrew Chavez penned the book "A New Romanticism: Updated and Revised" as a follow-up to "A New Romanticism: Essays and Poems," published in 2000.

"When I wrote the first book, I really didn't have a central argument," said Chavez, who earned a master's degree from K-State. "I'm presenting this book as one of those books that comes along every hundred years or so as a major challenge to the status quo."

Chavez said his book is a merging of philosophy and science.

"The modernists aim to make it new," he said. "My idea is to make it old and older until you get to the most ancient of all.

"The reason is, in the world we live in, we cannot play games. We need something reliable and trustworthy. One of the major themes of modernity is a sense of loss. We have no god, no guidance."

Chavez said the theory behind new romanticism is that there is still a divine presence.

"The things that were part of any other age or era are still here," he said. "We don't have any loss. We are not without guidance; we are not without leadership. We still have the same divinities."

Sing my doubtful and dubious singer
Let all the right notes flow from your willing and eager throat
And leap joyfully from the contours
Of your compelling and propelling lips

Excerpt from "A New Romanticism: Updated and Revised"
— From: Fixed And Focused

Following the form of the famous romantics William Wordsworth and Walt Whitman, Chavez's book has an opening essay, a long essay and poetry.

"Actually, a new romanticism is very traditional," he said. "One of the things we build on here is that the problems we have created here in this world will not be solved by reason alone.

"We have to have that divine influence. This book is showing how we can recognize this in our own minds and use it to solve problems."

Chavez said even non-academics should read "A New Romanticism."

"I have gone out of my way from the very start to be as clear as possible," he said.

Chavez self-published the book with Airleaf Publishers in July and said the company is helping him find a traditional publisher to pick up the book. Airleaf could not be reached for comment.

The book of 272 pages is available to order from Amazon.com for $17.95.

BEACH | project to finish by 2007

finished," Stanton said.

She said she and Gayla Adams-Wright, academic adviser, are planning to return to see the final result.

Stanton said she thought the additional space will help the museum with its projects and events.

"It'll be great for the museum to have all the extra space for storage," Adams-Wright said. "They've done a really good job. The changes they've done are really exciting, for K-State and Manhattan."

Renovation plans include an additional 17,000 square feet on two levels, which will result in an additional wing to the museum, three more galleries, two interior galleries and a sculpture garden outside.

The entire project is expected to be finished in October 2007.

A challenge in renovating the museum is trying to figure out where to put all of the art.

"It took almost three weeks to move all artworks," Scott said. "But it took several months of planning prior to that."

The main office area, which can be seen during the open house, previously were small individual offices. The walls in between have been knocked out, and the space was turned into a new conference room.

"People that visited the museum regularly and have been to the offices know how cramped it was," Scott said. "It is nice to have some room now."

Because of the renovations, offices were closed during the summer.

"It was hard to work," said Sarah Olson, senior in accounting and Beach art museum receptionist.

She said she's excited for the project to be finished, so everybody can return to their offices and no longer have to be in their temporary location.

Margo Fick, sensory research analyst, said the interesting part will be when everything is finished, and they start moving everything back.

"But that'll be the fun part for the staff," she said.

The museum offers a range of exhibitions, featuring artists of local as well as international importance.

Additionally, the museum has several educational programs, tours, workshops, lectures and other activities that are regularly organized for university students and public school children, as well as adults.

The museum's regular hours are 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. Tuesdays through Fridays and 1-5 p.m. on weekends. Admission is free.

knocked out for the rest of the season in the tenth game of the season against the Cowboys. His team went 6-10 a year after reaching the Super Bowl.

■ Ray Lewis – 2005 cover, 2004 season

The Baltimore Ravens linebacker had 20 less tackles than the previous season, when he had 120. He did not record an interception for the first season in his career, a year after picking off a career-high six passes. The Ravens failed to make the playoffs that season after winning their division title the year before. Even worse, six weeks into the 2005 season, Lewis suffered a season-ending injury.

■ Michael Vick – 2004 cover, 2003 season

The quarterback for the Atlanta Falcons was the quickest to become a Madden curse victim, suffering a fractured right fibula the day after the game was released. He played in only the last five games of the season, and his team went 5-11 a year after going 9-6-1.

■ Marshall Faulk – 2003 cover, 2002 season

The former St. Louis Rams running back suffered an ankle injury during the 2002 season. He rushed for only 953 yards, and never again broke 1,000 yards for a season.

■ Daunte Culpepper – 2002 cover, 2001 season

The former quarterback for the Minnesota Vikings went 4-7 on the season before he was benched with a season-ending knee injury. He threw for 1,300 less yards and 19 less touchdowns than the previous season.

■ Eddie George – 2001 cover, 2000 season

It took a year for the curse to affect George. The former running back for the Tennessee Titans rushed for a career-high 1,509 yards in 2000, but he bobbled a pass in the playoffs that was intercepted and returned for a touchdown, costing his team the game. George was injured in the following season and rushed for career-lows in yards (939) and touchdowns (5).

■ Barry Sanders – shared cover with Madden in 2000, 1999 season

Sanders was the first NFL player to grace the cover of the game. The Hall-of-Fame running back abruptly retired a week before training camp began in 1999.

Anybody who doesn't think there is a curse needs to look again.

The people who choose the cover boys should go after somebody who already has suffered a serious injury. The next cover boy should be Cincinnati Bengals quarterback Carson Palmer, because he had a season-ending knee injury last year in the first round of the playoffs.

That can't happen twice, can it?

Liquid ban relaxed in time for fall break travel; small bottles allowed

By Megan Moser
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

You won't have to worry about chapped lips during your flight home for fall break.

The ban on liquids and gels in carry-on luggage at airports, which left buckets full of half-used lip balm and other toiletries outside security checkpoints, was relaxed Monday.

Now, travelers can pack such items if they are three ounces or less and fit comfortably inside one quart-sized, zip-top plastic bag. Passengers can also take drinks on the plane if they buy them inside the security area.

The Transportation Security Administration, a division of the Department of Homeland Security, implemented the ban Aug. 10 after security officials foiled a plot to blow up several jets leaving London for the United States. Since the would-be terrorists used a kind of liquid explosive that airport scanning equipment cannot detect, TSA banned all liquids.

"We implemented those measures out of an abundance of caution," TSA spokeswoman Carrie Harmon said. "Now we feel like we know enough about the UK investigation to bring those items through. We're always looking at the threats and making those adjustments accordingly."

Peter Van Kuren, director of Manhattan Regional Airport, said travelers should go to the TSA or airport Web sites to check luggage requirements.

"The best thing for the students traveling for break is just to know what the rules are," he said. "Preparation is key."

Philip Zevenbergen, junior in regional community planning, flew home to Denver for fall break Thursday.

"I'm checking a bag, so I don't really bring lots of liquids anyway," he said. "My sister works as a flight attendant for Frontier Airlines, so she lets me know what I can and can't bring on an airplane."

According to the TSA Web site, www.tsa.gov, exceptions to the rules include baby formula and breast milk if an infant or small child is traveling, prescription and over-the-counter medications like eye drops and liquids for passengers with disabilities. Gel-filled bras are now allowed, as well. All items are subject to inspection.

Heather Harman, GSC-certified coordinator at Manhattan Regional Airport, said the restrictions haven't caused delays for passengers.

"Some people didn't quite understand, but we just explained it was for their safety."

Joe McBride, marketing manager at Kansas City International Airport, said they bought 3,000 plastic bags to give to passengers.

"It's been nothing but smooth sailing," McBride said. "We had one woman who thought she had to put each bottle in a separate bag, and she was able to give her extra bags to a man behind her who had forgotten his."

Students said they now expect strict regulations on plane travel.

"I'm kind of expecting more and more security rules to be put into place," Zevenbergen said. "I think it's a little overbearing. They tend to overreact. They make a rule, but then they allow exceptions."

Tuition to increase during the next 5 years

By Lauren Tice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Tuition costs increased at the beginning of the semester, and officials expect the trend to continue for the next five years.

There was a 12.8-percent increase at K-State in the 2007 fiscal year, said Bruce Shubert, associate vice president of administration and finance.

Tuition increased to help compensate for the increase in utility fees, and the consolidation of fees from graduation, transcripts and Career and Employment Services in addition to the regular 10-percent annual increase established by Student Governing Association, Shubert said.

"Tuition increases are essential to provide revenues that allows us to maintain and improve the value of a K-State degree," he said.

The tuition rate established by this increase will be effective through the spring and summer semesters.

SGA has created a "Five-Year Tuition Strategy Proposal" based on conclusion of the Student Senate Special Committee to Study Long-Term Tuition Strategies.

This committee was created to analyze current budgets and decide funding priorities to determine the best tuition strategies for students.

The proposal outlines that tuition would increase by $15 per credit hour, per year for every student.

Money from the tuition increases will be used to enhance faculty salary, undergraduate experience, academic programs student compensation. It also will be used for the redistribution of college specific fees. The proposal stipulates specific uses within these categories for the extra revenue.

"We must ensure quality faculty are attracted and retaihed. Additionally, we must provide an appropriate academic environment for faculty, staff and students," Shubert said. "Tuition funds are necessary to make sure we maintain our core capabilities."

While some students might not like to see tuition continue to increase, others do not mind as long as the money is being used in a way that best benefits students.

"I don't think it is as bad as some students think. It all depends on where that extra money is going," Amanda Brown, senior in electrical engineering, said.

Brown said she doesn't mind seeing tuition increase as long as it contributes to the students' academic performance.

"If it's going to fix classrooms in the older buildings, I don't mind. If it's going for things like better stadium seats at the football stadium, then I'm OK with it," she said.

Cassandra Beethe, sophomore in nutrition and exercise sciences and dietetics, is from Nebraska and pays out-of-state tuition. Beethe said she understands it is inevitable for tuition to increase, but hopes the money from the increases will keep programs alive at K-State.

"I don't want K-State to turn into another Nebraska, where majors get cut because there's no money," Beethe said.

Denison construction on hold

By Nicole Johnston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Drivers will have a chance to cruise down Denison Avenue without detours – but only for the weekend.

Employees of Pavers Inc. will take a break in between phases of construction leaving the road available to drive on all weekend.

This last phase of construction will be completed the third weekend in November, just before Thanksgiving.

The project is more than three months ahead of schedule, said Mark Taussig, interim associate director of facilities planning at K-State.

"The crews have really picked it up a notch so they could get done with the project," he said.

Ramone Lowe, freshman in animal science, said he would like the construction to be finished soon.

"It's a hassle to have to go all the way around to get where I'm going instead of going right through," he said.

Hannah Wilcox, junior in geography, said she is frustrated by the inconvenience.

"I always ride my bike in that area, and its annoying that there aren't any sidewalks available," Wilcox said.

Better lighting, safer turning lanes and a flashing yellow light at three of the pedestrian crosswalks will give the street a better handle on traffic and make it safer for residents, Taussig said.

"Altogether, traffic will improved," he said.

State of the University address today

By Kristen Roderick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The 2006 State of the University address will be at 3 p.m. today in the K-State Alumni Center Ballroom.

Even though it's right before fall break, Charles Reagan, associate to the president, said it's the only time they could schedule the speech.

"I think they work it out with the faculty senate and the president's schedule," he said. "We like to do it in September. Sometimes it's earlier and sometimes it's later."

There will be three speakers at the address. They are as follows:

- Librarian Roger Adams.

Adams will discuss the loss of faculty and the need to raise faculty salaries.

- Provost Duane Nellis.

Nellis will discuss the success K-State has had by setting priorities.

- President Jon Wefald.

Wefald will give a 20-year history of the school, and plans for the future.

The address is free and open to the public.

Reagan said printed copies of the speech will be available afterwards. They will be more detailed than the address.

Fall Break

This weekend it is fall break, so take advantage of no school on Monday and enjoy some of the last nice weather before it turns cold. Or, if the outdoors aren't something that interests you, check out the Aggieville specials, go shopping or catch up on sleep. Your best bet is to relax, since midterms are just around the corner and the stress levels are rising.

Heaven-sent heavy metal

By Jonas Hogg
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Amid kids downing two-foot pixy sticks and wearing shirts with slogans like "Satan is a nerd," stands Jason Grogan.

Grogan is 33 years old with a scruffy goatee; he has "Kari," his wife's name, tattooed on the knuckles of his left hand, "Demon Hunter" tattooed on his right calf and "Tequila Man" on his right bicep. He's a rocker, and Jesus Christ is his Lord and savior.

Grogan is youth director at First United Methodist Church, and Thursday night he and 10 other groups imported nationally known Christian heavy metal band Disciple.

The concert, which was Thursday in Manhattan's Wareham Opera House, sold about half of its 500 tickets, and brought a crowd ranging from children to middle-aged adults to listen to the faith-inspired message of Disciple and its opening act, Red.

In all aspects the event resembled any other heavy metal or hard rock concert. Heads were banged, pits were moshed, crowds were surfed and rockers were rocking, but both the musicians and the audience were there for a higher authority.

Disciple's and Red's high-energy, hard-rock aim to energize a younger generation of Christians, using a brand of music that, 20 years ago, was viewed with displeasure by many in the religious community. Modern music has increasingly become a Christian pulpit, however, with rock and rap groups putting a beat to spirituality.

"The difference between then and now is they have a relationship with Jesus Christ, and they promote that with their songs," Grogan said. "It's not just hymns anymore."

Cassidy Dellemonache, executive director of Youth for Christ, and Katie Wilcox, senior in youth ministries at Manhattan Christian College, said Christian youths with different music tastes are finding safer, more numerous, outlets.

"You can say that a concert like this is a safer atmosphere for students who like harder music, and without the negative lyrics," Wilcox said.

As for the transition from hymnal to hard rock, guitarist Anthony Armstong said being part of the change is rewarding.

"Music is going places it hasn't gone before," he said.

Kevin Young is the lead singer of the Christian rock group Disciple.

For everyone involved, using a new tool to spread their message is an exciting process, and Grogan said getting the young members of his ministry energized and in tune with their faith is worth the effort.

"They can see that hard music can have a good influence," he said. "In a Christian mosh pit, they pick you up."

One day for fall break decided by University Calendar committee

By Austin Apple
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The end of September marks not only images of falling leaves, but the relief of fall break.

"Students asked for a break that would be like spring break," Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said.

Fall break has fluctuated from one day off to two days off and then back to one day off during the last seven years.

This year and last year, students have only had one day off of school.

This is because of the required number of class days, Christmas break, and having a full week for finals, Bosco said.

These weren't the only reasons for limiting fall break to one day instead of two days.

"The faculty thought students didn't use the time wisely so they made fall break one day," Gayle Spencer, assistant dean of student life, said.

The placement of fall break was up to the University Calendar Committee, Spencer said.

"The Academic Calendar Committee recommended a Monday as opposed to a Friday, which also was approved by Faculty Senate," Monty Nielsen, registrar, said.

Fall break occurs in October, as it is the only full month of the fall semester when another student and a university holiday doesn't already exist, Nielsen said.

"It is at the slightly less than half-way point of the fall semester, and it does not coincide with a home football game, which was a student request, but not an absolute requirement," Nielsen said.

Although students said they would want more days off, some said that two days would be too many.

"One day is good because we had Labor Day off and Thanksgiving break is just around the corner," Mitch Spade, sophomore in chemical engineering, said.

Some students said they thought two days would be better than one day.

"As a graphic design major, I don't really get a fall break because of graphic design senior studio, but if I did I would want two days off, like a Friday and a Monday," Nancy Kirk, senior in graphic design, said.

TO THE POINT

Extra security measures not worth the wait

We understand the need for airline security, but the latest rules have gone too far – so far that the Transportation Security Administration repealed their Aug. 10 ban of liquids brought on planes.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Yes, there was a terrorist plot. Yes, we want to be safe. Increasing rules and complicating travel isn't the best way to improve airline safety, however.

Passengers now will have to put liquids in containers smaller than three ounces, place them in a one-quart zip top bag and carry them through security, increasing what can already be more than an hour-long delay.

What's next? Will they take our Chapstick, too? Oh wait; the TSA already did that. It's time we stop sacrificing personal time and effort for tiny changes in security.

Yet we don't feel any more secure. People always will find ways to circumvent rules. Terrorists will find new ways to terrorize.

Increased airline security is not going to go away anytime soon; it might become even tighter.

We can't fight the change. Just roll with it, and maybe by being prepared and knowing what we can and can't have on our flights, we can help make sure someone else doesn't have to miss theirs.

A job well done

President Bush's actions regarding Darfur more than commendable

OWEN KENNEDY

Friends, right-wingers, Republicans, lend me your ears – and save this Collegian. A progressive is about to say something considered blasphemy in the godless Church of Liberalism: President Bush is doing a good job.

No, strike that. A great job.

Before I'm ousted from my party, let me clarify: the president, while I disagree with him 999 times out of 1000, has been at the forefront of world leaders pushing for more to be done in Sudan, specifically in Darfur.

According to a Reuters report on www.savedarfur.org, President Bush told the United Nations on Sept. 19 the credibility of the UN is at stake in Sudan. Some might say the UN is impotent, inadequate, or as Sean Hannity says, "anti-Semitic," but the UN must do something – anything – to stop the genocide in this east African nation.

This genocide has affected more than 3.4 million human beings and has sent 200,000 refugees to neighboring Chad, according to reliefweb.com. The most appalling number, however, is the approximately 400,000 men, women and children killed since the beginning of this tragedy in 2003, according to savedarfur.org.

Since he took office, there have been two times that I've wanted to say "hell yeah" after hearing the president speak. One was after Sept. 11, 2001, and the other when he addressed the UN, and said the following: "If the Sudanese government does not approve this peacekeeping force quickly, the United Nations must act."

Bush was talking about a resolution to send UN peacekeepers, cute little blue helmets and all, to the devastated region of Sudan.

One might think to one's self: "Why would anyone oppose the world community intervening in such a tragedy?" But, there is some resistance.

As Thomas L. Friedman pointed out in his Wednesday column in The New York Times, China's delegate to the UN voted against sending peacekeepers to Darfur. Now when I think of human rights, oh yeah, I think of China, but really.

Friedman made sense of this vote, showing that China has strong oil interests in Sudan, interests that could be harmed if the UN ran blue-helmet-first into the region.

I'm not going to take a shot at the president and his oil interests – that's another column for another day. He has made it his charge to stop the eradication of innocent Africans, and for this I applaud him.

He has built momentum in the international community for something to actually happen in Darfur. This is something for which I will follow him until the very end.

I invite Americans of all parties and ideologies to jump behind the president, thank him for what he's done and encourage more action – except for the Green Party, stupid Ralph Nader, killing Al Gore's chances.

There are ways to make something happen.

Do some research or visit one of the Web sites I mentioned. We can halt this atrocity, all of us. And after that, we can go back to whining about Ann Coulter being too mean.

Hard work produces sense of accomplishment

BECKY STEINART

I am lazy. How lazy?

I'm so lazy, my favorite song is "Elevator to Heaven."

Like many people, I do anything I can to avoid a task that doesn't result in my immediate entertainment. Every now and then, though, rather than wish for a more amusing alternative, I find in myself a little thing called ambition. It's no dance around the maypole, but it has its perks.

Let's face it, schoolwork is tedious. It is unavoidable. But to be quite honest, if it is treated with the proper respect, it can be rewarding and even interesting.

I know from personal experience that completing an essay, drawing, math problem or job of any scale is more gratifying if I know I've exhausted my best efforts to do so.

Pride – it's not just one of the seven deadly sins anymore. There is something to be said for it. It certainly is a better feeling than the one that results after dawdling for hours, typing a few words and ending the night with the conclusion, "One and a half pages is almost four."

I know I am not alone. I, and undoubtedly others, have found that once I start a dread-inducing assignment, I begin to get interested, it is more enjoyable and my work turns out better.

So why the procrastination?

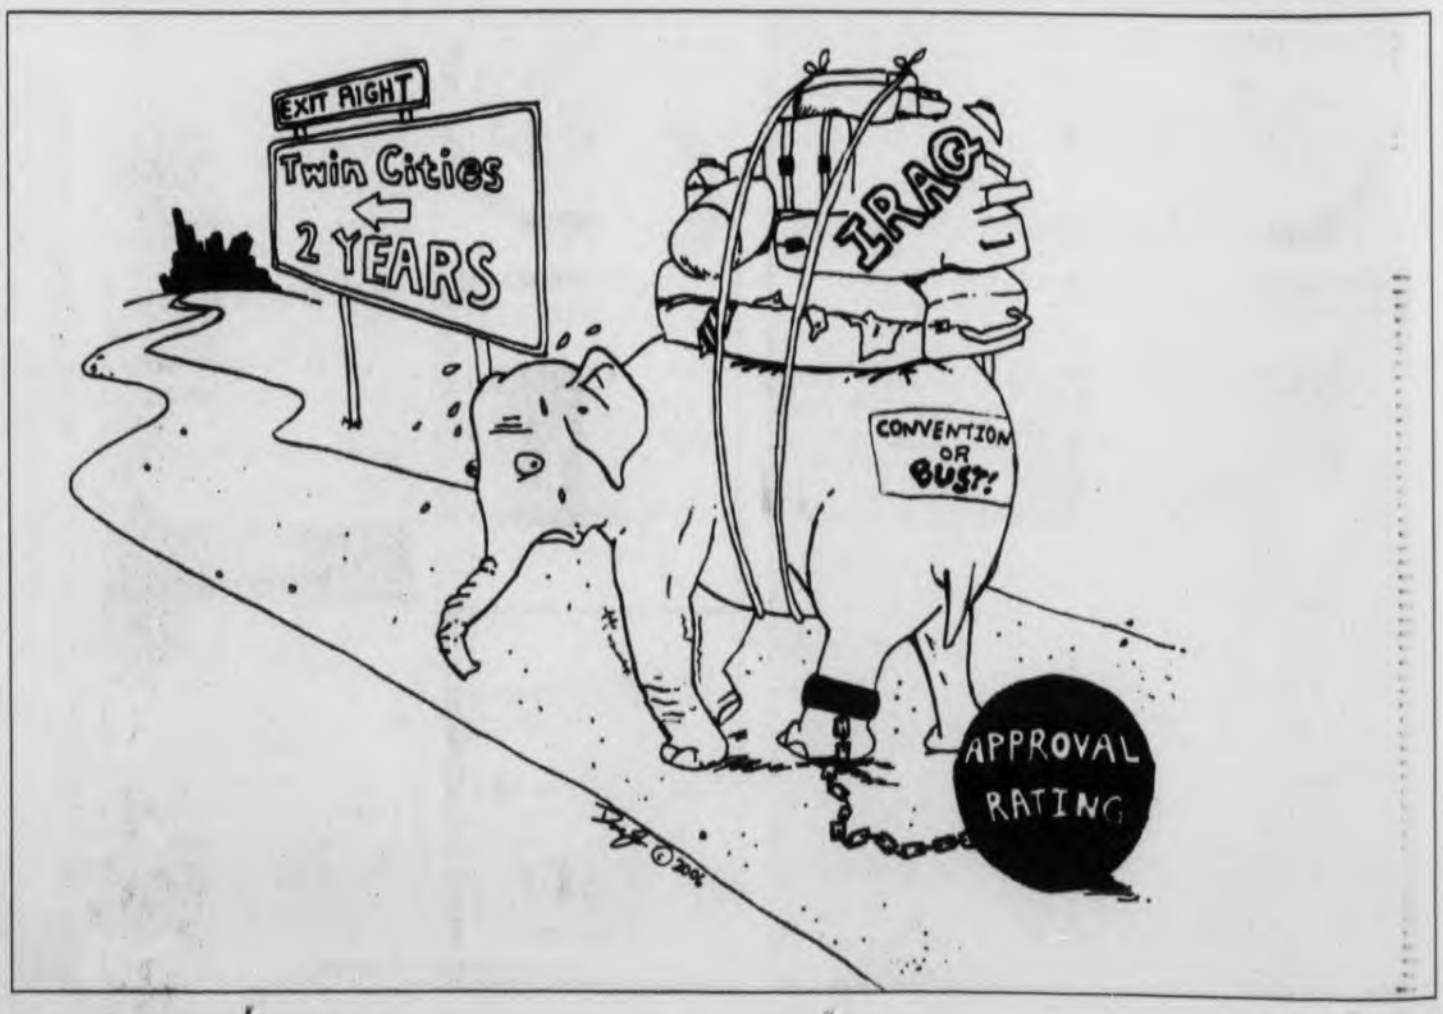
I know once I get started I'll be OK. I know in the end I'll be more pleased with my work. I know I'll get a better grade.

But it's a lack of self-discipline.

"Do your homework," I say to myself.

"I'll do it later," I respond saucily. "I need to take this two-hour break first."

"Yes, but coming right off that three-hour break, your brain might get a little sluggish, don't you think?"



I rarely am impressed by my own feeble excuses. When I look back and see the times I have gotten through on lackluster effort, it is discomforting.

However, in my sporadic bursts of ambition I have experienced small triumphs from a job well done.

Perhaps it's just some sort of rare nerd gene that only I and three other known people possess, but I like to entertain the thought of completing my post-secondary years with a sense of accomplishment and not a wistful, if-I'd-have-known-then longing to shake some sense into the past me.

Becky Steinert is a freshman in psychology. Please send comments to opinion@spub.ksu.edu.

TO THE EDITOR

Students should be more aware of rape risks

Editor,

It's that time of year again. No wait – it's always that time of year. People see a news story, or two, or three, about rape and say to me, "Oh, the natives are acting up again." (The natives are the "others." Because no one in OUR crowd rapes.)

If we put together the numbers of all the people treated for rape trauma by our area therapists, area hospitals, through the KSU Women's Center, the Crisis Center, area churches, Lafene, the KSU Police and the Riley County Police and Waubunsee and Pottowattomie – well, according to the Department of Justice report of 2000 – (http://www.ncjrs.gov/pdffiles1/nij/182369.pdf) a campus the size of K-State probably has around 400 rapes annually. Even if we were significantly different from the mean, say, cut it in half – 200 rapes?

Dozens of K-State women already have sought assistance this year. How many are acceptable? One isn't. One rape isn't acceptable. One man who trades in his humanity is too many. One woman who is made a slave for a moment is too many.

One man who cultivates a lifestyle of deception, seduction, pressure, pain, power, control with women, with men, must be identified and called to task. "The Press" often asks me, "Is K-State a safe campus?" I wonder, can someone show me a campus where the windows stay open all night? Where the fall breeze can bring the fresh Flint Hills air across your face as you lay on your bed, softly, peacefully falling asleep in the dark?

I know, I know, and buffalo are roaming and the deer and the antelope play. What is safe? K-State men, I am asking you to check out the legal consent laws. Even if no one ever taught you how to be a man of integrity or of honor, you'd better start teaching yourself, or if you're enlightened – teach your brothers and your friends.

You guys need to help snap each other out of it – this culture which is developing and enveloping us wherein you play the part of swaggering, selfish, uncontrolled, undisciplined mean people. You guys who know have to make it not OK in your groups to use drugs or alcohol or coercion to get control over people. Choose to be men who stand up for what you know is honorable.

Simply, respect means not taking control of another person. All you men who have come to the Women's Center in the past three years to figure out how to help your girlfriend or friend or sister who was raped, I humbly say, thank you, and you have learned the hard way.

Teach each other.

Collegian insults Lafene, makes it seem inept

Editor,

I am ashamed of the Collegian. The feeling of discontent steadily has been increasing, but it finally turned into full-blown shame last week when two reviewers were totally unqualified to analyze their assignments. I need only mention sushi and ska to drive that point home. However, this isn't about either of those articles.

Instead, this is about Erika Brunson's article on Lafene Health Center. The entire tone of the article is derogatory toward the clinic. The author points out that Lafene can't handle any and all circumstances that arise, as if that is the mark of quality.

It's not. Why does Lafene need a trauma center or an obstetrics center to be a good place to go for common ailments? That is the chief purpose of the health center: to provide common and needed services exclusively to the K-State community, primarily students. The doctors, nurses, technicians and staff at Lafene are there because they have a passion for working with the college-age group.

There are no pediatricians because no children attend K-State, and having to staff such specialists would drive up the costs and provide only a marginal benefit to the student body as a whole.

Furthermore, two of the three individuals quoted in the article obviously have no business making comments on the quality of the doctors.

Lafene is accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Healthcare Organizations, one of the strictest accrediting organizations in the United States. The staff is thoroughly trained, and many are certified and licensed. To say otherwise is to insult the entire system. There only are "real" doctors, nurses and technicians at Lafene.

As an afterthought almost, Brunson throws in a few clinics and times, but after reading her article, why would anyone want to go to Lafene?

Close parking isn't a right; involvement in residence halls merits better parking spot

Editor,

This is in response to Josh Rouse's article about parking regulations in front of the residence halls.

Parking in front of one's residence hall is a privilege. It is an honor given to students who have returned to the halls semester after semester, and those who work hard on their hall's governing board and Association of Residence Halls.

Being a third-year residence-hall resident, I've experienced every parking spot from the llama lot to the rock star parking up front. It was frustrating as a freshman to have to park so far away, but something I find even more frustrating is people parking in lots that they haven't been given the right to park in.

Those of us who have earned those spots by being involved in our halls then have to park in other lots.

So in conclusion, there is no need to change the parking permits, because the only people allowed in those parking lots are residents.

It's simple: get involved in your halls, and – instead of living off campus – stay in the halls, and you will be rewarded with an up-close and personal parking spot.

From the Public Editor:

Lack of minority feedback is troubling

Does the K-State Collegian have a race problem?

I think so.

I recently was reminded of this while thinking of the people who'd come to speak to me at my "Yell" sessions and noticed that, frankly, too many were white.

I'll spare you the math, but out of more than 70 people who have stopped by to share their feelings, ethnic and international students were rare.

Of the people I've asked for possible explanations, the best answer came from our adviser, Kim Baltrip. She said it's likely caused by mistrust built up from years of poor diversity coverage.

I could not disagree.

As much as I'd like to boast about minority students on staff or improved coverage, this paper has committed some terrible sins in its past. Foremost in many minds is the botched coverage of the Big 12 Conference on Black Student Government, an event here in spring 2004 that was organized by the Black Student Union.

Don't ask me why this event, which brought about 1,000 people here from across the nation, wasn't covered, or who was to blame. The best way I can explain it is that a lot of people screwed up in a short span of time, and I doubt I could call anyone who worked here back then blameless, myself included.

LOGAN C. ADAMS

Now I wonder if, more than two years later, we've improved.

Counting minority sources and stories on diversity topics might tell you something about how diverse a paper's coverage is, but what really matters is whether or not its readers are satisfied.

So I have a message for all K-State students who want this paper to change: take what's rightfully yours.

Newspapers might be the property of companies or private owners, but ultimately they belong to their readers. Students, this is your Collegian.

But there's a catch. Those who get involved have a greater share than those who sit on the sidelines.

Send a news tip. Write a letter. Yell at me. It's not difficult.

Or, if you really want to leave a mark, roll up your sleeves and join the staff. This paper is starving for talent, and we need all the help we can get. There is no faster way to change an establishment than from within.

I might not be the best person to say this, but the Collegian, and the media as a whole, need to better cover tough issues like ethnicity. It's our job, our responsibility, to report the truth, especially when it might be difficult.

So yes, the Collegian has a problem with race. Let's do something about it.

Logan C. Adams is the Collegian's public editor and a senior in print journalism. Send comments to publiceditor@spub.ksu.edu or catch him in person 10 a.m. to 12:15 p.m. Wednesday at the southwest corner of Waters Hall.

Senate supports commission's Manhattan smoking ban

By Megan Moser
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After much debate, Student Senate passed a resolution supporting a smoking ban in Manhattan.

The smoking ordinance proposal, written by Clean Air Manhattan, will have its first of two readings at the city commission meeting Tuesday.

Senators discussed whether or not to expedite the resolution. Normally, a bill goes through two readings before a vote, but some wanted it to pass in time for the commission meeting.

According to the resolution, "Student Governing Association recommends that the Manhattan City Commission adopt a citywide ordinance eliminating smoking in all workplaces and enclosed public buildings at all times."

Senators also debated whether to amend the resolution to exclude the word "all" in "all workplaces" and the words "at all times." The motion was denied.

Some senators took the negative side of the debate.

"Regulation at this micro of a level is really unnecessary," governmental relations chair Matt King said. "Why only in closed spaces? Why not everywhere?"

Others argued for the positive.

"I don't understand why the argument 'That's a personal choice,' should supersede public health," governmental relations director Tanner Banion said. "People in Manhattan should be able to enter an establishment and enjoy clean air."

Mayor Bruce Snead addressed the senate.

"I'm a strong advocate for this ordinance," he said. "I believe it's time for a smoke-free ordinance in Manhattan to protect everyone.

"The economic, medical and social evidence is clear. The goal is to improve the quality of life and to improve public health."

The resolution passed 37-15-0.

Tennis player returns to court following ankle injury

By Jessi Hernandez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Viviana Yrureta has good reason to be excited about the Wildcats' first tennis tournament of the year.

The junior from Puerto Ordaz, Venezuela, played in just two matches last fall – her first season at K-State – before an ankle injury left her sitting out for the rest of the season. Her freshman year, she was a member of the Central Florida team but never played a match.

She's ready to get her collegiate career under way, and the K-State Invitational tournament begins today.

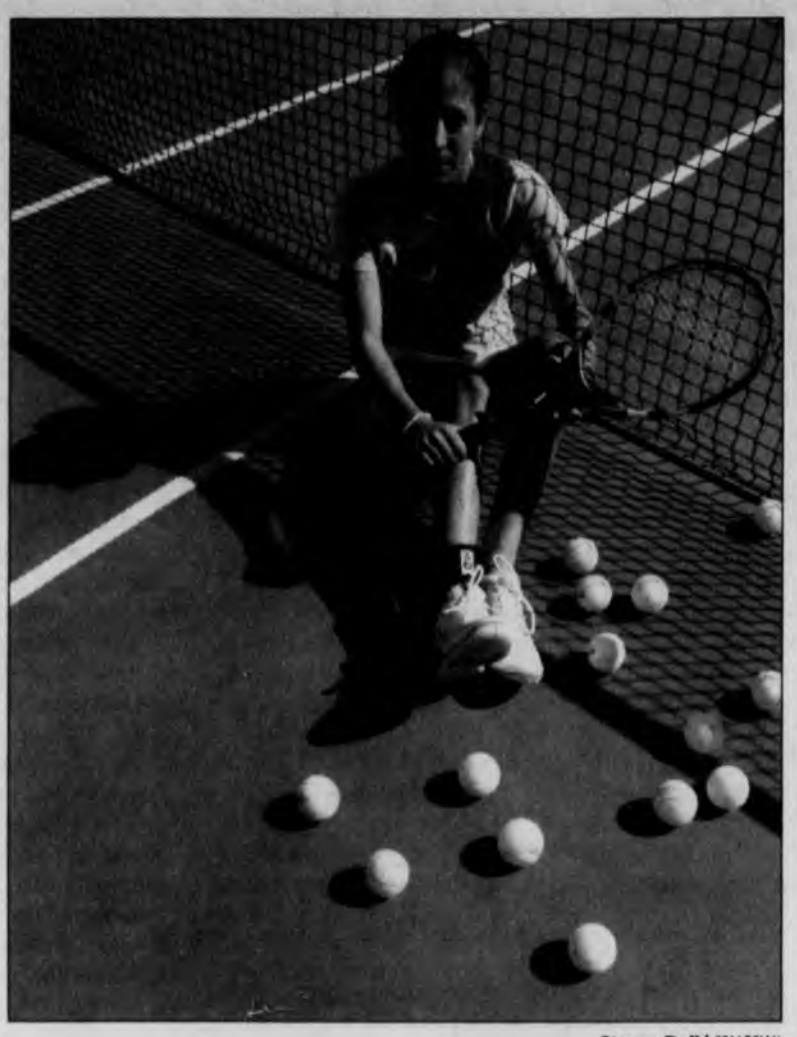
"I'm very excited about it – I mean, I just played in two matches last year," Yrureta said. "I'm looking forward to playing more matches and seeing what I can do."

Yrureta isn't the only one interested in how she will perform. Because of her lack of play at UCF and her season-ending injury last year, no one truly knows what she is capable of.

Coach Steve Bietau said he heard of Yrureta's interest in transferring from UCF two years ago from some of the Venezuelan members of the team.

"I went down to see her play when we first talked with her, and I felt like she was a strong player, but I didn't have a chance to see her play a lot of matches," Bietau said. "And really, nobody has for the past two years. I definitely felt like she was somebody that could help us."

Bietau said because Yrureta was injured so early in the season, he didn't have the chance to see how she matures as a player.



"Usually players aren't playing their best tennis at the beginning of the year, and that's where she was at that point," he said, "but she's still definitely someone that could help our team."

Yrureta said the ankle injury was something that had happened before play began in the fall, but she didn't think was serious at the time. In fact, she didn't stop playing originally because of her ankle, but because she got mono.

During the month or so she spent resting, Yrureta said her ankle continued to hurt, which led to the realization that she would need surgery. She had surgery in December, and for the next three months went through physical therapy.

"I was on crutches for 10 weeks, and then I couldn't run for two more

Keeping his word

K-State's loss marks departure of enthusiast's facial hair, curls

By Adam Hanks
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

I am a K-State fan and have been for quite a while. There really isn't any hiding it. I'm the guy who sings the fight song every time I hear it. I can't hear the "Wabash Cannonball" without gyrating back and forth. I even shaved after the football team's loss to Louisville last week.

That's right. I dictate when I cut my hair according to K-State's football record, at least for this shearing.

I went about a year without shaving my beard or cutting my hair. There really wasn't any reason for my radical new look, except it kept me warm in the winter. I spent spring 2006 in Colorado, and there is nothing better for keeping your face warm during nights in a tent than four inches of facial fuzz and a curly set of all-natural earmuffs. Other than that, it was basically just an extra cost in shampoo and bandanas.

It wasn't long before friends and family started to harass me about the length of my hair. When my roommates set my beard on fire, I finally took the hint. I told them I would cut it after K-State lost a football game.

"Ha," I thought, "that will show them." At first it was just an answer to keep people off my back. Then I started to truly believe I could keep my beard for a few more months; there was a lot of hair riding on the team's performance. But after the game last week, I had no choice. I had given my word, and now I had to lose my man-curls.

With the help and encouragement of a few friends, I made my way to the barbershop and walked away a little lighter and a lot colder after nearly half an hour under the knife.

Now, I know what some of you are thinking: "This guy was incredibly good-looking with a beard." I would tend to agree. The rest of you are wondering what kind of psycho would do something so extreme just

Reporters right for not revealing source of leaked testimony

The ruling made in the Oklahoma-Oregon football game two weeks ago was thought to be the all-time worst by many fans.

JEFFREY RAKE

Then along came U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White, who told San Francisco Chronicle reporters Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams last week he would send them to prison because they did – of all things – their job.

In what has become the sports equivalent of Watergate, Fainaru-Wada and Williams unveiled some of the best investigative reporting you will ever find when they released the book "Game of Shadows" earlier this year.

The book detailed the alleged steroid use of Barry Bonds, among other Major League Baseball players, and provided circumstantial evidence and compelling testimony from several sources. The book also included leaked Grand Jury testimony.

Judge White ordered the two reporters to turn over the name of the person who leaked the testimony, and threatened them with imprisonment if they refused to comply. He said the reporters have no right to withhold information from a federal grand jury in a criminal investigation and added they are "not above the law."

And so Fainaru-Wada and Williams were forced to make a decision. They could either protect their source and face a likely prison term, or reveal their source without consequence – allowing them to return to their families, jobs and to somehow regain a sense of normalcy.

Their decision was nothing short of heroic.

Fainaru-Wada and Williams refused to give up the person who leaked the testimony, and in doing so, they protected the field of journalism and everyone in America who has a right to hear the truth and be informed. If sources can't be held confidential, then news reporting as we know it is over. Sources would be too fearful to speak up.

About 50 journalists showed up to the San Francisco-area courthouse where Fainaru-Wada and Williams stood before the judge, all of them in support. Many wore T-shirts that read "Sportswriters for Freedom of the Press."

Dave Kindred, a well-respected scribe at The Sporting News, was one of those who went in support. He told me it was a political statement.

"Freedom of the Press is being

VOL | K-State looks to snap longest losing streak in 9 years

K-State will travel to the Lone Star State for the third time in as many weeks, and face No. 8 Texas at noon on Saturday in Austin.

The Longhorns have won seven of the last meetings in the series, including a current streak of five straight.

K-State (8-6, 0-4 Big 12) looks to put an end to its current five-match losing streak this weekend.

The recent stretch is the longest for the program since the 1997 season. The Wildcats also are looking for their first conference win to put an end to an 0-4 start, the longest K-State has gone without a conference win since 1993.

The Wildcats have been paced statistically by senior outside hitter Sandy Werner and junior libero Angie Lastra, and have received a spark in Big 12 play from sophomore middle blocker Megan Kroeker.

Werner leads K-State with 207 kills (3.91 kpg) and tallied her 12th match of 10 or more kills this season and third of 20 or more on Wednesday night against Iowa State with 21. The Topeka product is ninth in the Big 12 in kills per game and 10th in points per game (4.46).

The No. 8-ranked Longhorns (8-4, 3-2 Big 12) enter Saturday's match on a two-match slide, falling at Missouri last Saturday and dropping a five-game match at Oklahoma.

RUN | Cross country to compete at OSU Cowboy Jamboree

The K-State men's and women's cross country teams will travel to Stillwater, Okla., this Saturday, Sept. 30, for the 70th Annual Oklahoma State Cowboy Jamboree. The meet will be at the Oklahoma State Cross Country Course, with the women's race at 9:10 a.m., and the men following at 9:40 a.m.

K-State is coming off of a 20th-place women's finish and 30th-place men's placing at the Roy Griak Invitational Sept. 23. Sophomore Liliani Mendez highlighted last weekend's performances with a ninth-place individual finish out of a field of 288. Mendez was named the Big 12 Women's Runner of the Week for competition Sept. 22-24.

Last year, the Wildcat men's team finished 11th at the Jamboree, while the women's team scored a 12th-place finish.

SOC | K-State women's team to host weekend tournament

The K-State Women's soccer team hosts the 28th-annual KSU-Ed Chartrand Memorial Soccer Tournament this weekend in Manhattan.

The games are named after Edward E. ("Fast Eddy") Chartrand, a Leawood, Kan., resident, who played for the K-State Soccer Team. He died suddenly in May 1979 at the age of 22 of a never determined cause.

The Men's Soccer Tournament will be played the weekend of October 20-22.

Competing in this year women's weekend will be teams from K-State, Kansas, Colorado, Truman State, the Topeka Galaxy, Wichita State, Oklahoma State and more.

During the tournament, a K-State soccer athlete will receive a scholarship from the KSU-Ed Chartrand Memorial Fund. The scholarships are presented each year to members of the K-State's men's and women's team and are funded by private donations as well as donations by the Chartrand Charitable Foundation of Olathe, Kan.

Games will take place at Memorial Stadium and admission is free. The first match will take place at 9 a.m. on Saturday.

Students have an opportunity to fire military weaponry, witness a flyover and taste apple pie made from the recipe used by General Custer's wife at Fort Riley, Kan., Saturday.

Fort Riley's annual Apple Day/Open House will be from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. In years past, several thousand visitors have turned out for the event's numerous activities, said April Blackmon, community relations officer for Fort Riley.

"We want to show essentially the best of Fort Riley's past and present," Blackmon said. "We want to show everybody that we're here and what's going on, and just be a gateway to the community."

Besides the option to purchase apple pie and other concessions, all events are free and open to the public. All adults need a valid driver's license, and each vehicle needs current insurance and registration to enter, Blackmon said.

Opening performances for the Manhattan Arts Center's production of "The Odd Couple" are this weekend.

The show will be at 8 p.m. Friday and Saturday and 2 p.m. Sunday at the arts center, 1520 Poyntz Ave.

Additional performances will be October 5-8.

"We get a mix of everybody here," said Tess Purvis, director of marketing and programs for the arts center. "Especially with a production like this, that is well-known and a comedy, we get community members, students, and it's even a great thing for families to bring their kids to."

"The Odd Couple," written by Neil Simon, features two divorced men attempting to live together in a small apartment.

One is a neat freak and the other is a chronic slob.

This is the art center's first production of "The Odd Couple," and the first production of its theater season, which includes three plays and one musical each year.

The play is directed by Miriam Climenhaga and stars Charles Faulk as Felix, the neat news writer, and Frank Siegle as Oscar, the slobby sports writer.

"Even though the theme of the play is about older, divorced men, really, trying to get along with your roommate has no age," Purvis said. "I think that aspect is definitely something college students can relate to and will enjoy."

Tickets are $13 for adults, $10 for students and $6 for children. Students can buy walk-in tickets at the door on Thursdays and Sundays for $5.

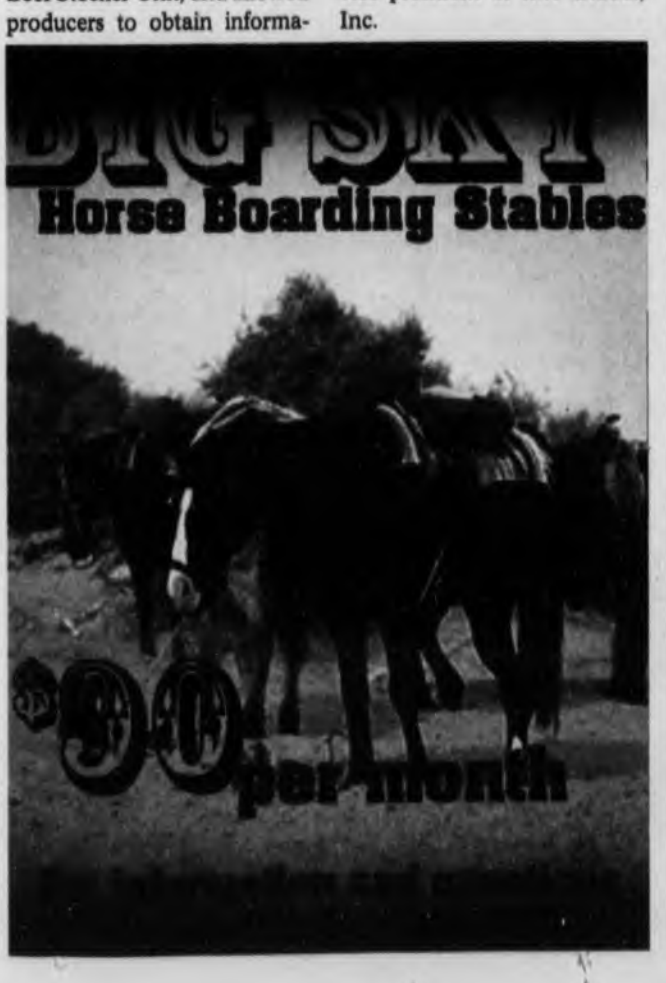
Tickets can be purchased on the Internet at www.manhattanarts.org, or by phone at (785) 537-4420.

Hands-on approach to beef industry

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State was host to the 2006 Beef Stocker Field Day on Thursday, where individuals attended different sessions regarding changes in the beef industry and more.

Dale Blasi, professor in animal sciences and industry, said the field day was at the K-State Beef Stocker Unit, and allowed producers to obtain information on a hands-on basis.



According to the event schedule, individuals attended different sessions throughout the day covering topics like the utilization of the individual stocker information and the performance of animal ID technology.

Speakers included Brad White, professor in clinical sciences, and Leann Saunders, vice president of IMI Global, Inc.

A barbecue lunch catered by Famous Dave's was available, and door prizes were given away throughout the day. Individuals were required to preregister for the event by Sept. 1 for $20.

Blasi described a stocker as a light-weight calf, usually around 250 to 500 pounds, that is shipped into Kansas and grown before going into the feedlot.

"Kansas is a major beef industry, where beef products dominate in the state," he said.

Thai student looks back on political conflicts

By Katelynn Hasler
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Chanitchot Detvisitsakun will encounter a changed government when she returns home from the United States.

When Detvisitsakun, graduate student in biology, left Thailand, she was guaranteed a job upon her return, assuming she earned her chosen degrees at K-State, she said. Even if current conflicts within the government continue, she said her promise of a job is still available.

"My job is still there," Detvisitsakun said. "They didn't change anything with that. The big picture is a political problem. It doesn't necessarily affect what will happen with things like that."

In Thailand, military leaders have seized control of the government, suspended the constitution and declared martial law. Since it was declared a constitutional monarchy in 1932, Thailand has had 18 military coups, but it has been 15 years since the last one.

"I agree with these actions," Detvisitsakun said. "Even though our country is a democracy, I think it is a good decision, this military coup. Soon they will find a highly qualified prime minister for an election."

Detvisitsakun is one of many international students learning of news from their native countries while at K-State. K-State has close to 1,000 international students each year, Stacey Bailey, foreign student adviser said. Many students come from India or China, Bailey said. Last year, K-State had 11 international students from Thailand.

"After their degrees are done, some students will go home," Bailey said. "Some will continue with a higher degree, some will transfer to another school, and some will try to find work, and there's a process they go through to do that."

Detvisitsakun – or Am, as she is known to her friends at K-State – came here several years ago to obtain her master's degree in genetics. She has stayed on to complete her doctorate in biology. After graduation in December, she plans to return to Thailand to become a university professor.

Detvisitsakun said she was drawn to K-State by a visiting professor, who traveled to her school in Thailand to increase awareness about the programs K-State offers.

The majority of international students are seeking graduate degrees, Bailey said.

One of K-State's pre-admissions offices focuses on recruiting international students. It is not uncommon for the director of the program to travel to different countries to increase awareness about K-State's programs, said Somer Chalfat, assistant director of international pre-admissions and recruiting.

"International students support the diversity that is important to the administration here, especially since the majority of K-State's students come from similar backgrounds," Chalfat said. "We want to welcome as many qualified international students as possible."

Mathematics professor receives grant to analyze black holes

By Adam Monroe
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A K-State professor is looking to further understand the structure and anatomy of a black hole.

He received a $135,247 grant to study black holes and space travel.

Louis Crane, associate professor of mathematics, was one of 30 chosen to receive the grant, which was issued by a philanthropic organization called the John Templeton Foundation. More than 200 people applied, and Crane received the most money of the applicants.

"The goal of the organization is to support and catalyze new areas of physics that are not being studied now," said Kristen Hubbard, scientific program manager of the Foundational Questions Institute.

The foundation donated a large sum to the Foundational Questions Institute, which consists of many scientists who read the grant proposals and decide where the money should be allotted.

"All of the grant recipients were chosen by an independent expert review panel," Hubbard said.

If people could further understand the structure and anatomy of a black hole, contain one and then shrink it to a containable size, they could harness the ultimate source of energy, Crane said.

"It may be possible to develop an artificial black hole that could power star ships," Crane said.

To make accurate calculations, Crane is first trying to find a way to combine calculations presented in both theories of relativity and quantum mechanics.

The result would be an extremely useful unifying equation.

The work being done right now is foundational work and is intended to yield calculations that future scientists and mathematicians can expand on.

"We are not able to do it yet, but with flying, for example, there was a 200-year gap between the realization that something may be possible and the first hot air balloon," Crane said.

Crane is beginning his studies by analyzing the theoretical structure and properties of black holes.

"I have already begun with preliminary calculations," Crane said.

Black holes are an interesting phenomenon because they are a consequence of general relativity, which states that matter bends space time, Crane said.

In a black hole, time bends until touching itself again. This means that the future is actually facing itself.

Once inside a black hole, the center is the future and the rest of the galaxy is the past.

Since time travel is not possible, a black hole is impossible to escape.

"Black holes turn matter into energy. You can throw matter into them, and they radiate energy," Crane said. "I might add, though, that we have never physically seen one."

Crane said the size of a black hole that may be beneficial to power a star drive would be in the range of one and 100 million tons.

"You can't really tell if it will work because you are in the range where quantum effects are very important," Crane said.

because the football team could not pull off an upset against No. 8-ranked Louisville.

The fact of the matter is I like K-State football – a lot. I grew up listening to my dad's stories about the Wildcats of the 1970s and how he never missed a home game. He supported the Wildcats through the toughest of times.

Now my father and I have a reason to take pride in Wildcat football, but that is not why I am a fan. I would go to every game, even if the team hadn't won a game in the last five years. There is more to K-State football than coaches, players, teams or records.

I am not literate enough to begin to describe what it is that gives me goose bumps every time I hear "Wildcat Victory," but the sensation is there all the same. Maybe in 10 years K-State will lose every game it plays, or ,maybe it will be national champions. There still will be a stadium of fans who will stand next to them through thick and thin, and I plan on being one of them.

Look for me; I'll be the guy with the extra-long beard.

eroded daily in this country... we decided to speak up in support of our colleagues," Kindred said. "To be there when Fainaru-Wada and Williams made their speeches to the judge was to be in the company of heroes."

Barring an appeal, Fainaru-Wada and Williams will be sent to prison because they did a better job of investigating than the U.S. Government. Their quest to bring legitimacy to baseball and to inform the public has brought about positive change, stiffer penalties and a greater awareness of the dangers of steroids.

Because of them, we know the truth about some of our professional athletes.

Bonds will likely continue his pursuit of Hank Aaron's all-time home run record in the coming seasons, but thanks to Fainaru-Wada's and Williams' pursuit of the truth, we can turn our heads the other way.

weeks, so I was out of exercising for about 12 weeks," she said. "And then I started playing a little bit – I think it was around April – and then practicing for around 30 minutes a day, but no more than that. I mean, I couldn't run, but the whole summer I was practicing more often, and now it feels great."

Yrureta's teammate and roommate, sophomore Katerina Kudlackova, said she felt bad about the rough time Yrureta went through last year and that she knew her absence would affect the team.

"It was sad, because she couldn't play, and she was a part of our team," Kudlackova said. "We knew that she could play well."

The K-State Invitational is scheduled to begin today at 9 a.m. with doubles play and will continue through Sunday. The Wildcats will face off against opponents from the Arkansas, Missouri and the University of Tulsa.

For Yrureta and her teammates, it will be a special season-opener, and they're hopeful for her to show how she has moved on after the challenges she faced last season.

"I think it's promising, because when we practice, she's one of the best here right now," junior Olga Klimova said. "I think she's excited about playing, more than anything else.

"It's good to have her back."

School's out

Jon Heder, Billy Bob Thornton of 'School for Scoundrels' offer insight into their careers, film hitting theaters nation-wide tonight

By Erica Brunson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Napoleon Dynamite meets Bad Santa; while these might seem like an unlikely pair, the two cross paths in the new film, "School For Scoundrels." This movie, which opens today, pits the man who brought the character of Napoleon Dynamite to life, Jon Heder, against the star of the popular, off-beat "Bad Santa," Billy Bob Thornton.

In a conference call with the Kansas State Collegian, the two stars discussed the movie, as well as possible future career moves.

Q: As a screenwriter, what do you look for in a script? What attracted you to 'Scoundrels?'
Thornton: I don't look for a particular genre, I just look for something well-written, something different than what I've just done. I'm not too big on action movies, so I ask them not to send any of those along.
Heder: I was looking for something that's not "Napoleon." I thought it would be nice to play a different, every-man sort of character. Also, I wanted a chance to work with the international superstar, Billy Bob.

Q: Is there any kind of character that you would like to pursue, that's not affiliated with what you are known for?
Thornton: Yeah, yeah I have. "Reed Fleming" – the world's toughest milk man. It's a comic that not many people know.

Heder: With 35mm film (Heder laughs).
Thornton: I didn't get shot, so I was happy. It was especially fun for me cause I got to shoot somebody at close range. I just had to stand there, bark out orders and shoot someone.

Q: Does this movie have a message for anyone lacking confidence?
Heder: In conjunction with the theme of the movie, be comfortable with who you are. Be yourself. Go for the girl. Make a fool of yourself.
Thornton: Being nice and honest doesn't necessarily mean weakness. You can be both.

Q: Do you think in real life you could open a "School for Scoundrels?"
Thornton: No, but I can open a school for people who like to stay home and watch television.

Q: As an Oscar winner, are there any career goals for yourself that you haven't reached yet?
Thornton: I think I've done every type of movie that I want to do. But it's funny cause I always wanted to play a teacher in a movie, you know, like maybe a college professor, but like more of a drama and someplace really depicting school life like it really is ... it's kind of odd that I ended up playing a teacher like this.

Q: Where do you see your career going in the next five to 10 years?
Heder: I see it going all the way to the top. I want to continue doing comedies. Continue to expand and try different roles, whether they be comedic or dramatic. I have a production company with my brothers and I am interested in diving into the behind-the-scenes world. Maybe directing, producing, writing – especially in the world of animation.

Q: Every actor has their paycheck movie. Halle Berry had "Catwoman." Do you have any movies that you look back on and think "What the hell was I thinking?"
Thornton: I guess I only have one movie that I consider a paycheck movie and that was "Armageddon," I suppose. I knew going into it that it was a blockbuster. At first I was pretty mad about the Halle Berry thing, never getting the part of "Catwoman" – I wanted that pretty bad. I went to Warner Brothers dressed up as "Catwoman," or whatever studio that was, I was uh, I was really high at the time.
Heder: Maybe when I have six or seven kids, I may do a paycheck movie. Until then each project is like, alright is this good, is this funny? What will it do for my career?

Q: Have you ever been in the situation where you have a close friend or mentor kind of honing in on your girlfriend?
Heder: There was a girl that both my brothers actually went after. My twin brother started ... oh, actually, well it was the girl that after my older brother had dated her for awhile, I was interested in. I started to work my way in and he kind of tried to butt his way in and that wasn't very cool.
Thornton: I had a girl once that I really liked that a girl went after ... but I kind of liked it.

Screech caught on sex tape

The 29-year-old, who played geek Screech Powers in "Saved By the Bell," engages in a number of sexual acts in the 40-minute tape, according to E! Entertainment Television.

Agent David Hans Schmidt has acquired the rights and is seeking a distributor for tape, titled "Saved By the Smell."

"Just when you think you have seen everything in this business, mankind has raised the bar another notch. Or lowered it," Schmidt stated in an article released in the New York Daily News Wednesday.

Off The Field with Quintin Echols

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Senior Quintin Echols is a big man. At 6-foot-1, 315 pounds, he has been a mainstay in the K-State defensive line for the entirety of his football eligibility and finished sixth on the team in tackles last year. Echols recently answered questions on issues ranging from his three-and-a-half year marriage to his worst job in high school.

Q. What is it like having children and playing football?

A. It is kind of hard being rough and tough in football and then coming home and having a little girl. She has probably made me a softy a little bit. I think about making her life a little better, so it makes me play harder. When I go home and I am tired, I will always have my daughter to make me feel good.

Q. How hard is it to balance football and marriage?

A. Being married gives you a lot more responsibility. When I first got married, it was a little harder, but now it gives me responsibility. When I get tired, I think that it is not just me I am playing for, so it actually helps now.

Q. Why do you like to hang out at the K-State Student Union?

A. I am a people person. I just like to sit in the Union and meet everybody that walks through. If you see other people in the Union, and I am not there, they might think the world is going to end. I just like to meet new people.

Q. What is the deal with the dreads and shells in your hair?

A. I have no idea what the shells are actually about. I am just doing something different. I am from Texas and not a lot people from Texas have dreads. I have had braids before, but I just wanted to try something new. The main reason I started it was so they could hang out of my helmet, though.

Q. What music do you like to listen to before a game?

A. I listen to a lot of rap and a lot of upbeat music to get me ready for the game. I guess my favorite artist is The Game.

Q. What is your favorite off-the-field activity?

A. Besides hanging out with my daughter and my wife, it is playing NCAA Football 2007. I am probably the best player on the team.

Q. What is the worst job you have ever had?

A. When I was in ninth grade I worked at Beefer's, a little burger place at home. I basically emptied out the grease and cleaned out the grease pots.

Q. You had some trouble with the preseason conditioning tests coach Prince introduced. How hard was it to pass that test?

A. It was one of those things that you wake up and wonder, "Why do I have to do this?" It was hard, but I think for a lot of us guys, it was a mental thing. When we put it in our minds that we could and just stopped thinking about it, then it was easy. To the naked eye, it is probably the hardest thing you are going to do in your life.

vs.

OFFENSE

In last weekend's clash with Louisville, quarterbacks Dylan Meier and Josh Freeman combined for a mere 139 yards passing on 43 attempts. Both should be happy to see tight end Rashaad Norwood return to the line-up this weekend, but the entire offense will have to step it up if it wants to overcome a talented Baylor defense.

Baylor's most glaring weakness has to be its running game. It is ranked last in the Big 12 Conference in rushing yards per game, with an abysmal 29.8 yard average. Conversely, its passing attack is one of the most potent in the conference. Baylor averages 278.3 passing yards per game, second only to Texas Tech.

DEFENSE

The K-State defense once again proved its mettle last weekend by holding the nation's leading offense to less than half of its usual production. The Wildcats were led by Marcus Watts who recorded eight solo tackles and an interception. With Bryan Baldwin sidelined for the season, the Wildcats will have to adjust quickly to cope with Baylor's formidable passing offense.

The Baylor defense is definitely its strong suit. In four games this season , the Bears have yet to allow an opponent more than 350 yards of total offense. This includes No. 17-ranked Texas Christian University. Additionally, the defense forces 2.8 turnovers per game on average and will be eager to take advantage of a Wildcat passing offense still trying to find its rhythm.

SPECIAL TEAMS

Other than punter Tim Reyer, the Wildcat special teams saw little action last weekend. Jeff Snodgrass had his only field goal attempt blocked, and return men Yamon Figurs and Justin McKinney were given only four return opportunities. Still, Figurs and McKinney both have shown they have the ability to break off a big return. They might just be the deciding factor this weekend.

The Baylor kicking game has looked sound so far this season. Senior kicker Ryan Havens is four out of five on field goals, two of which came from beyond 45 yards. Punter Daniel Sepulveda has been impressive, too, but has probably seen more of the field than he would like, already having recorded 24 punts. Also, the Bears have yet to return a kick or punt for a touchdown.

PREDICTION

Statistically, Baylor and K-State match up well against each other. Strong defenses coupled with one-dimensional offenses should be expected on Saturday. Because Baylor has yet to win a game decided by fewer than 10 points this season, the edge goes to K-State. With a pass happy Baylor offense, in his return to a starting spot, Marcus Watts returns an interception for a touchdown to give the Wildcats the victory.

Baylor quarterback rewrites record books

By Cedrique Flemming
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Shawn Bell could pose all sorts of problems for K-State.

The fifth-year quarterback for the Baylor Bears is rewriting the history books for his team, and K-State coach Ron Prince said Baylor's 1-3 record this season shouldn't fool anyone, because Bell and his teammates are a talented group.

"This team here has as fascinating an offensive firepower as any team we've seen so far in the young season," Prince said. "Baylor's quarterback is completing 66 percent of his passes, and he throws the ball and plays with tremendous confidence. If you didn't know any better, you could easily see him in the role of that team (Louisville) that we just played."

Bell
QUARTERBACK

In four games so far this season, Bell has completed 113 of 171 passes for 1,071 yards, seven touchdowns and only four interceptions. In comparison, K-State's starting quarterback, Dylan Meier, has gone 58 of 114 for 665 yards, three touchdowns and four interceptions.

Bell has passed for at least 200 yards in six consecutive games, dating back to last season. If he throws for that many yards against K-State Saturday in Waco, Texas, he will tie the all-time Baylor mark of seven consecutive games, set by Don Trull in 1963. No other Baylor player has reached four games.

He has completed at least one touchdown pass in six straight games as well. No Bear has completed a touchdown pass in seven straight games since 1987.

The Baylor offense is based heavily on passing plays, and defensive end Ian Campbell said he is looking forward to facing this pass-happy offense.

"That's always fun for a defensive end – to try to get in there and make as big an impact as you can," he said. "We're going to scheme and do whatever we can to try to get to that quarterback."

Bell established Baylor's all-time career completions record last Saturday against Army. He now has 431, passing Jeff Watson (1994-1997), who previously held the record with 425. Bell ranks 19th nationally and fourth in the Big 12 Conference with 256 yards of total offense per game.

He was put on the 2006 Manning Award Watch List on Aug. 23, an honor given to 22 student-athlete quarterbacks at the beginning of each season. Nebraska's Zac Taylor and Iowa State's Bret Meyer were the only other Big 12 players named to the list.

Morriss' spread offense stumbles

By Jonathan Garten
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Most of the K-State defenders are familiar with the spread offense.

They witnessed first-hand how effective it could be last year in a 59-20 loss to Texas Tech. The Wildcats still remember the Red Raider offense gaining 684 yards on 97 plays.

They do not have to be reminded of just how good the spread can make an opposing quarterback look. Texas Tech quarterback Cody Hodges finished the day with 643 yards passing – 73 yards short of an NCAA single-game record.

"(The spread offense) is the next new thing in college football," coach Ron Prince said. "When you start to see offshoots of this spread offense in college football, it makes it very interesting for defensive coordinators."

Red Raider coach Mike Leach introduced the spread offense to Texas Tech after arriving in 2000. From 2002 to 2005, the Red Raiders have finished the season with the nation's No. 1 passing offense.

K-State is 1-3 against Texas Tech since Leach has introduced the spread offense.

Baylor coach Guy Morriss hoped for similar results when he hired Lee Hays as his offensive coordinator on Dec. 12, 2005. Morriss coached the spread when he and Leach were assistants under Hal Mumme at the University of Kentucky.

Hays – a defensive end and linebacker when he played in college – learned the spread offense by shadowing the Red Raider coaching staff in his free time. He then put that knowledge to use as the offensive coordinator at Division I-AA West Texas A&M from 2003 to 2005.

In 2005, West Texas A&M won 10 games for the first time in 55 years. Hays' offense led all Division I-AA schools in passing offense with more than 350 yards a game.

However, Baylor's transition to the spread has not yielded immediate success. The Bears are 1-3, despite holding opponents in regulation to 20 points or less in every game.

"We're struggling a little bit," Morriss said. "We're still learning as we go here."

So far this year, Baylor has averaged nearly 300 passing yards per game, but it ranks last in Division I-A in rushing, averaging 29.8 yards per game.

"We're not going to run it 50 times a game, but when we do call it, we're trying to be efficient," Morriss said. "We're trying to throw the ball to open up the run game."

To help install the new system, Morriss hired West Texas A&M quarterback coach Wes Phillips as quarterback coach and Texas Tech graduate assistant David Nichol as a graduate assistant. Morriss, who coached in the spread at Kentucky as an offensive line coach, has taken over the offensive line.

Junior safety Marcus Watts said he sees similarities between the Baylor and Texas Tech offenses with sets using four or five receivers and wide spacing between the linemen.

"They spread it out, and they make a lot of space," Watts said. "With a lot of space, there's a lot of holes, so we have to be ball-aware."

Fully recovered

After months of rehabilitation, Marcus Watts will make his return as a starter on Saturday

By Nick Dunn
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Marcus Watts stood inside Bramlage Coliseum at the team's weekly press conference, answering questions while sporting a new addition to his wardrobe – a black-and-white T-shirt he received from special teams coach Tim Tibesar. Tibesar gave Watts the shirt as part of being named Special Teams Player of the Game against Louisville – a game in which he posted nine tackles, an interception that he returned 68 yards, and an athletic onside kick recovery in the fourth quarter.

The shirt read "Special Forces – Silent Warrior," a rather appropriate title for the junior free safety from Hays, Kan.

Although the shirt served as a nice reward for his efforts during one game, it also could be seen as a symbol for much more. Watts' title on the shirt, "Warrior," could be an accurate description of a player who has had to endure much in the past 10 months. Indeed, the "Warrior" in Watts has led him to where he is today.

It was the last game of the 2005 season – a home game against Missouri that was the final game of coach Bill Snyder's historic career. Watts remembers the day as cold and rainy. With a 4-6 record, the Wildcats were out of bowl contention for the second year in a row. The only thing left to play for was pride.

Watts was finishing a breakout season for which he would receive honorable mention All-Big 12 honors and be named K-State's Most Valuable Defensive Player and Special Teams Player of the Year. He would finish the year with 71 tackles and two forced fumbles, but the stats didn't tell the whole story. Watts played with an energy unmatched by the rest of the players on the field – an energy that seemed to pump up everyone in the stadium.

The play was just like any other – a simple run up the middle by Missouri. However, it would end up being the last play Watts would make on a football field for a long time.

"I just came in low and made the tackle," Watts said. "My leg was back, and there was really only one place for it to go, and that was out."

Watts suffered a frontal dislocation of the left hip and had to be carried off the field to an ambulance. His parents were at the game, and his father, Mark Watts, immediately went onto the field to talk with his son.

"When I saw he wasn't getting up, it was very nerve-wracking not knowing what to expect," Mark Watts said. "He'd been injured before, but nothing where he was just laying out there. I just felt I needed to be there for him so he had a family member down there."

Marcus said the pain was bad enough, but what made it hurt even more was that he wouldn't be able to finish Snyder's final game.

"Coach Snyder's last game meant a lot to me," he said. "I'd been through the good and the bad with coach Snyder. We had our ups and downs, and we got into it a couple times, but he was a great coach for me and a great teacher."

The post-game press conference was obviously an emotional time for Snyder, but one of the only things that prompted tears from the somewhat reserved coach were questions about Marcus.

"Marcus was in tears, and I said to him, 'You will get through this. You'll be all right,'" Snyder said at the time. "Then he said, 'Coach, I so much wanted to make plays for you.'"

◆ ◆ ◆ ◆

Marcus knew he had a long road ahead of him. He had been injured before. In fact, he tore his medial collateral ligament during his senior year at Hays High School. But even that injury didn't compare to the rehabilitation process in store for the hip injury.

Before rehab even began, Marcus thought he might never play football again.

"I was determined to get back, determined to prove to people that this wasn't going to slow me down," Marcus said. "A lot of people said that this was going to end my career, but I wasn't going to let this hold me back."

Head athletic trainer Matt Thomason and the rest of the trainers had never dealt with an injury like Marcus'.

"If it had been a rear dislocation, Marcus wouldn't be playing," Mark Watts said.

Mark called some friends who were trainers for NFL teams, friends he met during his time as a basketball player at Fort Hays State University. After some research, a variety of exercises were designed to keep the range of motion in the joint. Marcus would run in a swimming pool in an effort to preserve his 4.3-second 40-yard-dash speed and relieve the pressure placed on his hip.

Shortly after he was hired as the new coach, Ron Prince said that after speaking with Marcus, he was sure he would make a full recovery.

"A lot of it was just sitting down and talking with him, and I knew," Prince said. "I knew. When you're around those kinds of players, there are just some of them where it's not cockiness, it's legitimate. I've said since the beginning he didn't have much he had to prove to me."

The trainers and coaches were helpful in the recovery process, Marcus said, but the most important people were the ones closest to him – his family.

"They went through it with me," Marcus said. "They stayed in the hospital. They kept my head looking in the right direction and kept me from looking at the negatives. I couldn't ask for a better family in the process."

Safety Marcus Watts had to be carried off the field on a stretcher during the Wildcats final home game last season on Nov. 19 against Missouri. Watts dislocated his hip on the play and missed all of spring practice.

◆ ◆ ◆ ◆

After sitting out much of the offseason as part of the rehab process, Marcus began the season at No. 2 on the depth chart at free safety, behind former walk-on Andrew Erker.

He still played a lot, trying to push thoughts of the game against Missouri behind him, trying to return to his pre-injury form.

Putting the injury out of his mind was difficult, especially in the second game of the season against Florida Atlantic. It was cold and rainy that day, just like the day he was injured.

However, Marcus knew his style of play would be lost if he thought too much about the injury.

"Now I don't think about it when I play, because if I did, then I wouldn't be playing my type of game," he said. "I'd be playing passive, not aggressive."

Marcus' aggressive play has carried him the first four games this season, and he has now officially regained his starting position. More importantly, he is back to doing what he does best – disrupting opposing offenses.

Since childhood, Marcus has displayed the type of energy he now uses every Saturday, his father said.

"He was go, go, go all the time," Mark said. "He played all the sports. He even played golf one year, but he was always wanting to keep moving, and in golf, you have to be patient."

The stories of Marcus' earlier days flow from everyone who knew him then. Teammate Donald Raymer tells a story of playing against Marcus in high school when Marcus accounted for four different types of touchdowns in the first quarter.

In high school, Marcus was a two-time state champion in pole vault, a runner-up at state in the long jump, and an all-state performer in football.

In the first game of his senior season, Marcus' coach told him that if he ran the opening kickoff back for a touchdown, he would buy Marcus a prime rib dinner. Sure enough, Marcus secured himself dinner that night.

Marcus grew up a Kansas Jayhawks fan and wanted to play for the Jayhawks after high school. Kansas lightly recruited him but then told him he didn't warrant a scholarship offer.

Then K-State entered the picture, recruiting Marcus as a defensive back, but quickly switching him to wide receiver. After the 2004 season, Snyder talked with Marcus and then-defensive back Jordy Nelson about switching positions. So far, the move has worked for both players.

"If you could have 22 players like Marcus Watts in the NFL, you'd be over the salary cap," Prince said. "You can see his confidence on the field. He's the right kind of kid."

The hip injury could have knocked Marcus out. It could have stolen the passion he routinely displays on the field, but instead, it only motivated him.

"I knew it was going to be an uphill battle," Marcus said. "But now it feels better than the rest of my body. It's been a long, tough process, but now there's nothing holding me back."

Ron Prince will coach the first road game of his career when K-State takes on Baylor this Saturday at Floyd Casey Stadium. Prince will try to become the second current Big 12 coach to win his first road game.

Prince to face first road challenge as K-State coach

Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Coach Ron Prince will be in unfamiliar territory Saturday night.

The cheers from more than 40,000 fans to which he has become accustomed when he runs onto the field will not be there, only to be replaced by boos and a hostile crowd bent on seeing K-State and Prince fail.

Prince will make his Big 12 Conference head coaching debut on the road at Baylor, but he said he plans to do the same things he has done in his first four games, all of which have been at home.

"To take our team down and play in someone else's stadium, that will be a new experience for all of us. It will be the first time for many of us to go to one of these Big 12 stadiums as coaches," Prince said.

Although this will be the first Big 12 game for most of the coaching staff, Prince said he is fortunate to have several veteran players who have experience in conference road games.

One of those players, Thomas Clayton, said not much will change in how the team prepares this week for the game.

"Going down there and preparing well this week will make all the difference in the world," Clayton said. "The only thing that is going to be different is that we're probably going to get here (the football stadium) a little earlier on Friday."

Prince said he will not change how he prepares for games, but said there are several different aspects to road games and how teams prepare for unfamiliar environments.

"One of the things we look at every week are the circumstances of the game and how the game is going to be played," Prince said. "There will be some things different on the road. Crowd noise on third down will be directed at a different group, so we will practice that and deal with that."

The numbers might be against him, though.

Out of the 10 Big 12 coaches returning with Big 12 coaching experience, only Gary Pinkel of Missouri won his first conference road game. Fortunately for K-State, Baylor has won only two out of the last seven Big 12 home openers.

However, the players are not worried. Several have been on the road in the Big 12 and said they know what to expect.

"I am ready to get out there and play against Baylor," senior Ian Campbell said. "They will be a good team, but I think we will present a big challenge for them."

5 keys to victory for the Wildcats

Austin Meek
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

1. TAKE AWAY BAYLOR'S RUNNING GAME

Sounds easy, right? Baylor averages 18 rushing attempts and a paltry 29.8 rushing yards per game. The Bears won't run it much, but the Wildcats can't be so focused on stopping Baylor's passing attack that they give up a big play on the ground.

2. SECONDARY HELP

Bryan Baldwin's injury means the rest of the secondary will have to step up. Cornerback Byron Garvin, who moves into a starting role opposite Justin McKinney, needs a solid game against Baylor's high-powered passing attack.

3. RED ZONE SUCCESS

The Wildcats have converted just eight of 14 chances inside the opposing 20-yard line this year, which ranks last in the Big 12 Conference. Penalties, turnovers and mental errors have cost the Wildcats in red zone situations. These miscues must be eliminated if the Wildcats want to win in Waco.

4. PLAY EFFICIENT IN THE PASSING GAME

Dylan Meier doesn't need to throw for 400 hundred yards and five touchdowns. He just needs to take care of the ball, sustain drives and hit open receivers. If Meier plays an efficient game, K-State has a chance to dominate time of possession against the pass-happy Bears.

5. MAINTAIN COMPOSURE ON THE ROAD

Floyd Casey Stadium isn't exactly the Big House at Michigan or the Coliseum at Southern California. Still, this will be K-State's first game in a hostile environment and Ron Prince's first road game as a head coach.

First 4 K-State games give a clearer picture

JONATHAN GARTEN

When Ron Prince took over the K-State football program, predictions ranged from another last-place finish to Big 12 North contender. Optimists thought Prince would succeed with many starters returning from the 2005 team, while pessimists believed he would struggle to install his new systems.

When K-State stumbled in week one against Division I-AA Illinois State, 2006 started to look like a rebuilding year. But after two solid wins and a hard-fought performance against No. 8-ranked Louisville, hopes of a bowl game are still alive.

Now that the Wildcats are heading into Big 12 Conference play with four games under their belts, there are a few things that look a little clearer.

■ Receivers should receive and not throw. After watching quarterback Dylan Meier struggle to stretch the field for the better part of four games, the Wildcats called for their wide receivers to pass twice against Louisville. The first, thrown by Cedric Wilson, was intercepted. The second, a pass from Jordy Nelson, was nearly picked off after he left it well short of tight end Jeron Mastrud. Hopefully in the future, Prince will let the players do what they were recruited to do.

■ A special teams coach can make a world of difference. After former coach Bill Snyder didn't have an actual coach for the special teams last year, Prince hired Tim Tibesar to take charge of the unit. The result, an all around solid unit.

■ The defense is good enough to keep K-State in any game. Even on a day when the Wildcat offense offered the defense little help, it still managed to hold Louisville, the nation's No. 1 scoring offense, to less than half its scoring average. If Prince and offensive coordinator James Franklin can figure out how to score points, there should be no reason K-State can't go to a bowl game.

■ The Wildcat offense is in the midst of a full-blown identity crisis. After having limited success with a balanced attack in the first three weeks, Prince and Franklin decided to come out throwing against Louisville. K-State opened its first nine drives with a pass and played two straight series without calling a run. Here's to hoping the offense discovers its niche and sticks to it.

■ Through four games, Meier has completed a mere 50.9 percent of his passes for 665 yards. His biggest problem has been completing passes down field. It's hard to believe that out of the Wildcats' original five quarterbacks in spring practice, Meier was the best of the bunch.

■ The fair-weather fans still have not returned. For a group that used to refer to itself as "the best fans in the country," it's a little sad that they could not even sell out Snyder's last game, the game during which Snyder Family Stadium was named, or the game against No. 8 Louisville.

Big 12 breakdown

The northern division is up for grabs; Texas, Oklahoma best in the south

By Austin Meek
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For the last decade, non-league games provided the Big 12 Conference an opportunity to flex its collective muscle. This season, however, the Big 12 limps out of non-conference play with an 0-9 record against ranked opponents and losses to Montana State, Army, Toledo and Houston.

Now the good news: non-conference play is nearly over, and Big 12 teams can turn their attention to the conference schedule. Here's a breakdown of the Big 12 heading into the opening weekend of conference play.

NORTH DIVISION

Nebraska

The Huskers are No. 2 in the nation in scoring offense, and quarterback Zac Taylor is completing more than 70 percent of his passes. The Blackshirt defense, which led the nation in sacks a year ago, surrenders about 11 points per game. A 28-10 loss at Southern California was the only non-conference setback for the No. 21 Cornhuskers.

Missouri

Quarterback Chase Daniel is making Missouri fans forget about Brad Smith in a hurry. The sophomore signal caller is No. 9 in the nation in total offense at 288 yards per game. The Tigers also have the stingiest scoring defense in the Big 12 at 9.2 points per game. However, a soft non-conference schedule provided no real tests for Missouri.

Iowa State

Iowa State ranks last in the Big 12 in pass defense, scoring defense and total defense. Factor in a schedule that has sent the Cyclones to Texas and will send them to Oklahoma, and it's tough to see Iowa State making a run for the North Division title.

K-State

Coach Ron Prince seems to have K-State headed in the right direction. The defense has shown marked improvement, led by safety Marcus Watts and linebacker Brandon Archer. For K-State to be a factor in the Big 12 North, however, the offense needs to find a way to put the ball in the end zone.

Kansas

This season's version of the Mark Mangino quarterback shuffle features redshirt freshman Kerry Meier and senior Adam Barmann. Whoever lines up under center has the luxury of handing off to Jon Cornish, who is second in the conference in rushing yards and all-purpose yards.

Colorado

The only winless team in the league lost at home to Division I-AA Montana State and then nearly knocked off No. 9 Georgia on the road. Unless the Buffs can fix an offense that ranks last in the Big 12, a third-consecutive division title looks unlikely.

SOUTH DIVISION

Texas

With the conference's leading rushing attack and a defense that yields just 24 rushing yards per game, Texas appears to be the favorite in the Big 12 South. However, a 24-7 home loss to Ohio State shows that the Longhorns can be beaten.

Oklahoma

The Sooners would be undefeated if not for an officiating meltdown at Oregon. Paul Thompson is completing 62 percent of his passes, and Adrian Peterson is running like an All-American. However, the Sooners have been disappointed with their defense, which ranks 11th in the Big 12 in yards allowed.

Texas A&M

Texas A&M has been one of the Big 12's pleasant surprises, in part because of a much-improved pass defense that ranks No. 6 in the nation. However, non-conference games against The Citadel, Louisiana-Lafayette and Louisiana Tech revealed little about the Aggies.

Texas Tech

Mike Leach's latest prodigy, quarterback Graham Harrell, leads the league in total offense, and receiver Robert Johnson's 34 catches are tops in the nation. However, the Texas Tech offense fizzled in a 12-3 loss at Texas Christian University.

Oklahoma State

Quarterback Bobby Reid is No. 2 in the nation in pass efficiency, and wideout Adarius Bowman averages nearly 100 yards receiving per game. The Cowboys gobbled up three non-conference cupcakes before falling 34-25 at Houston.

Baylor

Quarterback Shawn Bell has flourished in Baylor's new spread offense, completing more than 66 percent of his passes for 1,071 yards. However, the Bears struggled to find the end zone in non-conference losses to Army, Washington State and TCU.

President speaks of past, future of K-State in address

By Adrianne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State has made significant achievements since 1986, said President Jon Wefald during the 21st-annual State of the University Address Friday afternoon.

Wefald discussed the future of K-State and the changes that have taken place in the last 20 years. Provost Duane Nellis and Faculty Senate President Roger Adams also made presentations during the address.

PRESIDENT JON WEFALD

K-State's future lies in several of its new facilities, among other things, Wefald said.

The $54-million Biosecurity Research Institute, which opens later this month, is the most important building constructed in K-State history, Wefald said. K-State also has a Food Safety and Security Program, which includes 160 scientists from six colleges and 14 academic departments.

"We have the best Food Safety and Security Program in the world today," Wefald said. "The program is vital to the national security of the United States of America."

Wefald also said K-State has gained 40 acres of land in Olathe, Kan., on which to build a research and advanced degree campus.

Looking back, Wefald said he was given numerous tasks by the Kansas Board of Regents to accomplish when he was appointed president.

K-State's enrollment had fallen from 19,900 students in 1981 to about 13,500 in 1986, Wefald said. In his first two months, Wefald hired seven alumni as K-State's first admissions' representatives. He also hired more than 20 people from 1986 to 1988 for his new administrative team.

"It was time to stop the decline and regain our footing and move our operation forward," Wefald said. "If you look at big-time universities, we are one of the very few who practice delegation and authority."

Also, K-State's public image was suffering in 1986, Wefald said. When K-State students won Rhodes, Marshall, Truman, Goldwater and Udall scholarships, Wefald said he used the achievements as part of a public relations campaign for the university. K-State ranks number one in winners of the five scholarships among public four-year colleges and universities from 1986 to 2006.

A century of agronomy

By Adrianne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

He wanted to farm after serving in the Army during World War II, but it was too expensive.

Instead, Oliver Russ, 86, attended the Vocational Agriculture Program at then-Kansas State College of Agriculture and Applied Sciences in 1946.

Russ, resident of Seneca, Kan., graduated with bachelor's and master's degrees in agronomy and was a faculty member at K-State from 1965 until his retirement in 1990.

Along with other retired and current faculty, alumni and current students, Russ attended the Department of Agronomy's last day of centennial events on Saturday.

Agronomy is defined as a "branch of agriculture dealing with field-crop production and soil management," according to the Future Harvest Centers' Web site.

The department was established by the Kansas Board of Regents on July 17, 1906.

While at K-State, Russ said he researched wheat science and helped with K-State Research and Extension. Russ also experimented with herbicides in their infancy during the mid-1960s until his retirement and provided research information to chemical companies.

"If you think about the Roundup that we have now, I worked with it when it was in a little bottle," he said.

Russ said his fondest memory at K-State was educating farmers about his herbicide research. He said the biggest advancement in agronomy is the use of self-propelled combines, which he started using in the early 1970s.

"When I think of the first thrashing of soybeans (in the late 1940s), we put them on a tarp and beat them with a stick and used the wind to clean them," Russ said.

In 1909, the 320-acre agronomy North Farm, 2200 Kimball Ave., was Smoking ban considered

By Megan Moser
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

City commissioners will introduce legislation for a city-wide smoking ordinance at their meeting tonight.

The city will discuss three possible ordinances ranging from a complete ban to permitting smoking only during certain hours. After an open discussion, commissioners will vote on whether to pass an ordinance to a second reading, when it would officially be passed.

"What usually happens is there is passage of an ordinance, perhaps as presented and perhaps with changes, for the second reading," Mayor Bruce Snead said. "As with every issue on our agenda, there is an opportunity for public input. We'll afford anyone who wants the opportunity to speak briefly."

The ordinances were first proposed to the commission by Clean Air Manhattan in December. Since then, the commission has had three work sessions and researched the legislation.

The meeting will be at 7 tonight in the City Commission Room at City Hall. The public is urged to attend.

125th Red Cross Blood Drive begins

By Regina Nowak
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Red Cross needs blood.

Students can help by donating at the birthday-bash blood drive on the second floor of the K-State Student Union, beginning today and ending Thursday.

More than 920 people are needed to show up at this year's 125th Red Cross blood drive to donate 710 pints of blood, said Kristi Ingalls, donor recruitment representative for the Flint Hills Red Cross. This amount can save the lives of about 2,130 hospital patients.

"We have less than a half-day supply of O negative," Ingalls said.

Ingalls said giving blood could save anyone's life.

"When you're 72 years old, there is a 95 percent chance that you'll need blood at least once," she said.

One donation could save three lives, yet less than 5 percent of the population donates blood.

Cory Jabara, senior in pre-medicine and life sciences, received a call Thursday night and signed up to

COLUMBIA TO INCREASE FINANCIAL AID BUDGET

NEW YORK CITY – What's in it for you?

Administrators say all money raised for the capital campaign will fund projects and programs to make Columbia better for students, and they stressed that no goal is more immediate and relevant than improving financial aid.

The $4-billion fundraiser allocates $440 million to undergraduate aid.

Columbia's current budget for financial aid is $58.5 million. The capital campaign funds will increase the university's resources for undergraduate financial aid by about 37 percent.

SAN JOSE STATE U. FOUNTAIN CREATES ODOR

SAN JOSE, Calif. – The San Jose State University Silva Family Fountain, better known as the fountain near the music building, reportedly gives off a foul odor.

"I have seen random people say stuff about it," Mark Navasca, junior in occupational therapy, said.

Kym Bersuch, SJSU supervising plumber, said the fountain was turned on on Sept. 21. He said the fountains are treated with a "floating chlorine arrangement" when they are initially turned on.

HOOKAH SMOKING ATTRACTS LSU STUDENTS

BATON ROUGE, La. – A faint peach scent pervades the night sky in a subtle cloud of smoke. Students huddle around a colorfully adorned vase-like structure, discussing music and movies as they pass a hose around the circle. The soft sound of bubbling water hums as each person takes a turn.

Hookah, a large water pipe of South Asian origin, is attracting a greater number of smokers at Louisiana State University.

Visitors tour Konza Prairie, learn about researchers' studies

By Adam Monroe
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

People from all over Kansas gathered on the Konza Prairie Research Natural Area Saturday for its biennial visitors' day.

The day included a variety of activities intended to allow nature enthusiasts the chance to enjoy the land and to learn about research scientists' work there.

Events included hayrack rides, guided hikes, and homestead and bison tours. Wright said more than 300 bison now graze the Konza Prairie.

"We are from the community and didn't even know what is out here, so I think these events are a great way to get people to come out and see what's here," Jarod Wilson, Riley County resident, said.

A "critter show" housed local and imported varieties of snakes and other prairie animals. The public was allowed to hold a 6-foot-7 Bull Snake, and a 4-foot-5 Corn Snake.

"Most people have been receptive towards the snakes," Jennifer Nemec, Konza Prairie volunteer, said. "The Corn Snake is about to shed, so people have been surprised about his milky color."

The research being done on the prairie is intended to add to current knowledge about the processes of a natural prairie habitat in Kansas, said Valerie Wright, Konza Prairie ecologist and environmental educator.

"We have more than 30 years of data," Wright said.

She said research scientists at Konza Prairie studies the long-term effects of fire, grazing, and climate on the prairie.

"It has to do with long-term data and change so that we can understand the development in our part of the world," Wright said.

Wright also is in charge of the Konza Environmental Education Program. This program incorporates local school children in fifth grade and higher into the scientific process and allows young scientists to contribute to the study.

"The children get to do the same research that the professionals are doing," Wright said.

"In a sense, they actually get to become scientists for a day."

Bilingual activities, mooncakes mark Chinese Middle Autumn celebration

By Jesse Sachdeva
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A long line formed in the parking lot of All-Chinese Buffet Friday night.

Several hundred people gathered to celebrate the Chinese Middle Autumn, or "moon festival," in an event sponsored by the Chinese Students and Scholars Association and the K-State Chinese Language Department.

"Middle Autumn Festival holds an important place in Chinese culture, similar to Thanksgiving in American culture," Wei Wu, Chinese language instructor, said. "It's a time for reunions with family and a celebration of the end of the harvest season."

The festival takes place annually on the autumn equinox of the lunar calendar.

Cameron Addington, senior in finance, was among those gathered outside the restaurant. Addington is a student in Wu's Chinese II language course. His class performed at the festival.

"There are about 15 students in my class," Addington said. "We've been working on this song for about two weeks."

Addington said the song is a Mandarin translation of "If you're happy, and you know it, clap your hands." He said he was a little nervous about performing in front of a crowd of native speakers.

Wu and He Wang of the Chinese Students and Scholars Association were bilingual emcees for the festivities. Wang spoke in Mandarin, and Wu spoke in English.

Joslyn Brown | COLLEGIAN

Alex Lu, 6-year-old son of Max Lu, associate professor of geography, watches presentations in both English and Chinese at the Chinese Moon Festival celebration at the All-Chinese Buffet Friday night. More than 200 people attended the festival.

The evening opened with a dinner provided by All-Chinese Buffet. Several K-State faculty members were on hand for the celebration, including College of Business Administration Dean Yar Ebadi and Associate Dean Ike Ehie. Ebadi and Ehie visited China as part of a university delegation last March. Ebadi recounted his experiences for the crowd.

Ebadi and Ehie visited universities in Beijing, Shanghai and Taipei.

"President Wefald has a goal of raising the percentage of students who study abroad from 2 percent to 10 percent," Ebadi said. "The purpose of our visit was to help build the relationships to make that possible."

Ebadi joked with the crowd about a gift he gave delegates from a university in Beijing.

"They said, 'I bet this was made in China,' and sure enough, it was," he said.

The evening continued with a performance of the legend behind the festival by a group of American students.

Nathan Shoe, senior in mechanical engineering, played the cruel emperor, and Trisha Culbertson, graduate student in biological and agricultural engineering, played the moon goddess, Chang'e.

The party closed with the song by Addington's class and the serving of the traditional Middle Autumn Festival dessert, mooncakes.

"We have 200 students from China here at K-State, many which can't be with family for this celebration of reunion," Wu said.

Local student band wins opportunity to open for 1980s musician in Topeka

By Josh Rouse
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When Chris Maxwell was younger, he never dreamed he would one day open for 1980s rock star Eddie Money. However, as Maxwell, sophomore in open option, took the stage Saturday night at the Capital City Bank Burnin' Downtown Street Festival in Topeka, that's exactly what he did.

Maxwell is a keyboardist/guitarist for the band Yard Art Project, which won the Burnin' Downtown Battle of the Bands. As part of the band's victory, it was given the opportunity to be one of the opening acts for Money.

"It's dreamy," Maxwell said. "I consider opening for him a big step for a band. He's old, but he's big. There's going to be a big crowd for us, too. I just think it's cool that people are coming back to watch us when they can."

The night also was significant for Maxwell's sister, Kelsie Maxwell. She said she has seen him perform, but to see him on that type of stage was cool. She even made a sign that said "I love Maxwell" for the show.

"I personally was telling all my friends and made a big deal about it," Kelsie Maxwell said. "I missed the Battle of the Bands because of soccer, so when I heard they had won, I was like, 'Yeah!' and I was so excited. To me, it was a huge ordeal, but to him it was just another concert. Out of the family, I probably made the biggest deal out of it because we're so close, and it's good to see him get something he deserves."

Bassist Jeremy Albert, who graduated from Manhattan Christian College in 2000, said performing live was a reward for the band's dedication to its music.

"My favorite part was probably just getting up there and playing with the guys," Albert said. "It was a lot of fun to get up there and rock out and not have to worry about anything. It's just enjoyable to strap on an instrument and know our hard work would pay off as soon as we hit first chord."

Albert also said he appreciated feeling the energy from the crowd.

"It's just a thrill to know that there are people out there not only to see you, but they hear you and enjoy what you're doing," Albert said. "Another aspect is the satisfaction that people liked what you did enough to give you an opportunity like that. It's so amazing."

Lead guitarist/singer Zach Johnson also said it was a good opportunity because many new listeners heard the band's music.

"I was excited," Johnson said. "It was the biggest sound system and the biggest stage we've ever played for. I wasn't really that nervous, just excited. A lot of people liked it, from what I heard."

The band will play Nov. 18 at P.J.'s Bar. It is working on a new CD, which it plans to release in January. The CD will contain remakes of some of the band's old songs and four new tunes. For more information, go to www.myspace.com/yardartproject.

News, with heaping sides of sarcasm, make The Daily Show a popular source of information

SCOTT GIRARD

He is smart, engaging and not afraid to question even the most popular celebrities and political icons.

He is, of course, Jon Stewart, and he might be one of the most influential sources of political information on television. His show, The Daily Show with Jon Stewart, airs on Comedy Central and attracts guests from Hollywood actors to former presidents.

Recently, the president of Pakistan, Pervez Musharraf, was a guest on the program. On the show, Stewart started by offering tea and the supposed "American delicacy," a Twinkie, to the president.

The discussion was lighthearted, and Musharraf showed a sense of humor many people do not equate with a Muslim leader.

That is what is great about The Daily Show. It moves icons out of the media ire and allows them to open up and show their true emotions and convictions. Stewart has the special ability to mix humor and intelligent questions into a conversation that makes guests comfortable and accessible.

Although the show takes a sarcastic approach to world events, it is an informational program. It focuses on many of the issues that affect citizens, especially those of the younger generations.

According to a survey by CNN in September 2004, people who watched The Daily Show regularly knew more about political issues than those who read newspapers or watch other television news. The survey also noted that viewers of The Daily Show were 54 percent more likely to have four or more years of college education. So Bill O'Reilly's claim that the viewers of Stewart's show were comprised of "stoned slackers" and "dopey kids" is tremendously incorrect.

I am sure stoners and slackers are more likely to watch The Daily Show, but so are the more intelligent citizens of the younger generations.

A study from the Annenberg Public Policy Center of the University of Pennsylvania showed that 60 percent of the Daily Show viewers who get their news from other sources turn to the Internet for information. Television news sources came in last.

There is no question that Stewart leans a bit to the left, but he is by far the most entertaining source of news. He makes fun of both parties. There is more Republican humor than Democrat humor, but he always makes the news hilarious.

The liberals need that type of person in the media. They field a barrage of slanderous and hateful words from the right and need someone to combat conservatives like Joe Scarborough and Sean Hannity on MSNBC and Fox News, respectively.

I am not saying everybody should watch The Daily Show, but other news organizations should note the show's strategy. Obviously, the producers of The Daily Show have figured out how to attract the interest of politically conscious citizens.

Maybe it is time for other news organizations to look for alternatives that will reach all U.S. citizens. When a large portion of the younger population shuns television news stations to get news from the Internet and The Daily Show, the change could be for the better.

Younger generations are looking for more than just straight news, so what would it hurt to try something new?

Fast food plumps American bodies with calories, sugar, sodium

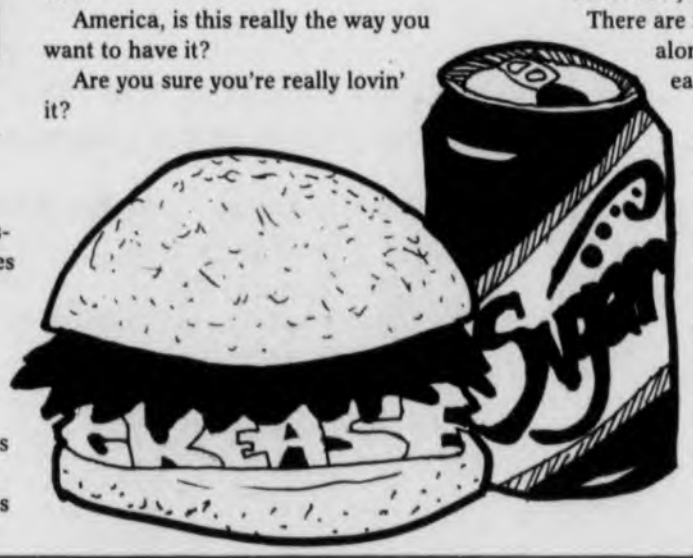
ALEX PEAK

Do you ever think about how many calories you consume in a day or how much sugar, saturated fat and sodium your food contains?

"Ba da ba ba ba, I'm lovin' it!" Those familiar with this catchy advertisement jingle salivate at the thought of McDonald's french fries when they hear it. But what is there about McDonald's meals to love? Greasy food that – when eaten regularly – can lead to obesity and other health problems?

"Have it your way," is a catchphrase touted by Burger King. So fast-food connoisseurs, did you know that "your way" involves an array of threatening health problems?

If you need some gruesome reality to make you a believer, consider viewing "Super Size Me" or reading "Fast Food Nation."



It's not just greasy, saturated fat that adds poundage to Americans' over-fed epidemic. The amount of sugar our nation consumes is also to blame for our demise.

According to Prevention magazine, on average, most people guzzle a pound of sugar per week. That's more than 50 pounds per year.

This addiction to sugar is responsible for two-thirds of the obesity cases in the United States, according to the book "Ultra Prevention."

America, is this really the way you want to have it?

Are you sure you're really lovin' it?

By consuming an overabundance of sugar, not only are your teeth at stake, but also you are more susceptible to diabetes.

According to "Ultra Prevention," too much sugar leads to high levels of insulin in your blood, makes you gain weight – especially in your midsection – and can increase blood pressure.

These are just a few examples of ailments. There are more tribulations that come along with not watching what you eat.

Some of the problems associated with obesity and being overweight include hypertension, risk of stroke, gallbladder disease, sleep apnea, cancer and osteoarthritis.

This ballooning out and morphing of the body isn't a new idea for us to digest. It's almost as if the food industry has been out to get us for years – one candy bar, french fry or pop can at a time.

The more we come to terms with this obesity epidemic, the better the advertising companies for fast food restaurants get at convincing us how great burgers, fries, malts and deep-fried anything are.

The more diet and exercise methodology is preached to us, the harder those food companies toil to persuade us that we love – and need – fast food.

After all, fast food is convenient, fairly inexpensive and hand-delivered – just the way we like it.

It's OK for us to go against the American way, just this once. It could save your life, or at least add a few years.

Instead of putting back a huge meal and then taking a nap, or grazing for hours while watching television, try to move around and exercise throughout the day and eat reasonably sized meals that aren't solely processed or fast food.

Always keep in mind: you are what you eat.

As Red Cross turns 125, it needs help from students to continue global aid

The Red Cross celebrates 125 years this week. To commemorate, it is having a birthday blood drive today, Wednesday and Thursday.

We encourage students to donate blood during the next three days. Giving blood is a great way to help those in need. Blood banks around the country are experiencing a severe shortage, and anyone who is able should donate. In return, donors will receive a sense of satisfaction that they made a life-or-death difference in someone's life.

Even if students don't donate during the campus drive, local blood banks need help, too, and students should keep those in mind.

And it's easy to donate blood. Once students answer necessary questions about health and hygiene, Red Cross volunteers will prick their fingers to check iron levels and – if iron levels are adequate – sit the students in a chair for a few minutes while inserting a needle into the students' arms to draw blood. Once it's over, students have the option of getting their blood typed for future use.

If donating blood makes students uncomfortable, they can donate time or money to the Red Cross. Both ensure the Red Cross will continue be able to help the less fortunate.

Regardless of what it is, students should do something during the Red Cross birthday blood drive to make a difference, no matter how small.

'The Odd Couple' opens to rave reviews, to run next weekend

By Katelynn Hasler
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The phrase "the show must go on" took on a new meaning this weekend.

Even a cast member breaking an elbow didn't thwart the popularity of "The Odd Couple" among audience members Saturday evening.

The Manhattan Arts Center opened its production of "The Odd Couple" Friday night, with additional shows Saturday and Sunday.

Saturday's show continued despite a lead character breaking his elbow backstage in the middle of the performance. Cast members said they were glad they kept the show going and were happy with their performances.

"Opening night was terrific," said Charles Faulk, who plays Felix, one of the main characters. "Tonight went well, too. I don't think the audience missed one joke."

The play also will be performed Oct. 5-8 at the arts center.

Written by Neil Simon, "The Odd Couple" began on Broadway and has since been made into a TV show and movie. The play features two divorced men trying to live together in a New York apartment. One is a neat freak, and the other is a chronic slob.

Audience member Rich Esposito said he enjoyed the performance.

"It's just a good play," he said. "I've liked what I've seen. I think they're doing a pretty good job with it."

Another audience member, Tom Taul, agreed. He said some of the actors made him feel as though he was watching the characters from the TV show.

"I think it's very funny," Taul said. "This is my first time at Manhattan Arts Center, but when I saw 'The Odd Couple,' something I knew, I thought it would be funny."

The cast and crew have worked on the performance for the past six weeks, putting in 12 to 15 hours of work each week, said director Miriam Climenhaga.

The play is Climenhaga's first with the Manhattan Arts Center.

"All of the cast members I've either known since I was little or worked with in a previous show somewhere else," Climenhaga said. "The cast has good chemistry. The camaraderie helps the show go well."

Cast members aren't paid but perform because they like their fellow actors and love being on stage, Faulk said.

Joslyn Brown | COLLEGIAN

Felix, played by Charles Faulk, is consoled by friends and poker budddies after finding out about his divorce in Neil Simon's "The Odd Couple." The play was performed this weekend at the Manhattan Arts Center.

"Most people who work here do it because they love the theater," he said. "The pay is simply the joy of doing it."

The arts center offers many ways for interested students to get involved, cast member Madison Krehbiel said.

"We had students helping with the set and the scenes," she said. "There are so many opportunities to connect with the arts center. Just calling and getting on the mailing list is a good start."

The arts center will present three more plays this year. Next on the schedule is a musical, "All I Really Need to Know I Learned in Kindergarten," on Nov. 10-12 and 16-19.

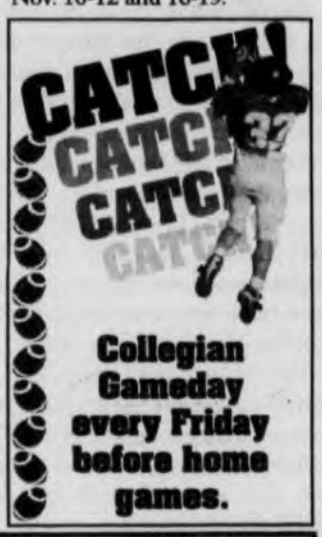
Editor,

In Thursday's edition of the Collegian, Megan Molitor wrote an article exploring the gender gap among K-State students. The article quoted Angela Hubler, director of Women's Studies, and stated that "the undergraduate gap exists because some colleges at K-State, like the College of Agriculture and the College of Veterinary Medicine, still enroll more men than women."



As a student in the College of Veterinary Medicine, I felt compelled to correct this completely incorrect statement.

First and foremost, the College of Veterinary Medicine is not part of the undergraduate system at K-State; it is a professional curriculum.

Secondly, the College of Veterinary Medicine student population is about 75 percent women, while nationally, veterinary schools are closer to 80 percent female. Men are vastly outnumbered, and this has been the trend for over a decade now.

As an aside, I doubt that "these traditionally male professions are much more highly paid" than graduates of other colleges at K-State. Either Hubler is grossly misinformed and not equipped to be quoted as an authority on the subject, or Molitor severely misquoted her.

Breakthrough performer

Kyle Williams — Safety

The senior safety was one of the few bright spots in K-State's 17-3 loss to Baylor. The Wildcats held the Bears to 294 yards passing.

Williams had five tackles, a forced fumble and two pass breakups. His fourth-quarter interception was the first of his career.

Turning point

Thomas Clayton's 1st-quarter fumble

Clayton fumbled on the Baylor 10-yard line with the game still scoreless in the first quarter. The turnover ended one of K-State's only chances to score a touchdown.

Baylor capitalized on Clayton's error four plays later when quarterback Shawn Bell connected with receiver Trent Shelton for a 75-yard touchdown pass.

K-State turned over the ball three times inside the Baylor 25-yard line. Yamon Figurs and Thomas Clayton both fumbled at about the 10-yard line and Josh Freeman threw an interception from the 24-yard line.

Game MVP

Punter Tim Reyer, a junior from Wamego, Kan., arguably had his best performance of the year. Reyer had two punts downed inside the 10-yard line.

He had plenty of opportunities in the 17-3 loss to the Bears, punting 10 times for an average of 45.3 yards per punt. At times, his punts were the Wildcats' most effective method of moving the football. Two of Reyer's first-half punts were fumbled by Baylor, setting up K-State around midfield.

Sloppy play plagues K-State in Waco

By Jonathan Garten
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

WACO, Texas – Quarterback Josh Freeman threw to wide receiver Jermaine Moreira as he sprinted across the middle of the field. Moreira caught the ball and broke away from the defender covering him and eluded another as he ran up the sideline.

With no one between Moreira and the goal line, he stepped out of bounds at the 24-yard line. Three plays later, Baylor defensive back Jordan Lake intercepted Freeman in the end zone.

Baylor capitalized on continuous sloppy play by K-State, winning 17-3 at Floyd Casey Stadium Saturday.

The Wildcats committed 11 penalties for 84 yards. And when K-State was not being penalized, it couldn't hold on to the football. The Wildcats turned the ball over five times.

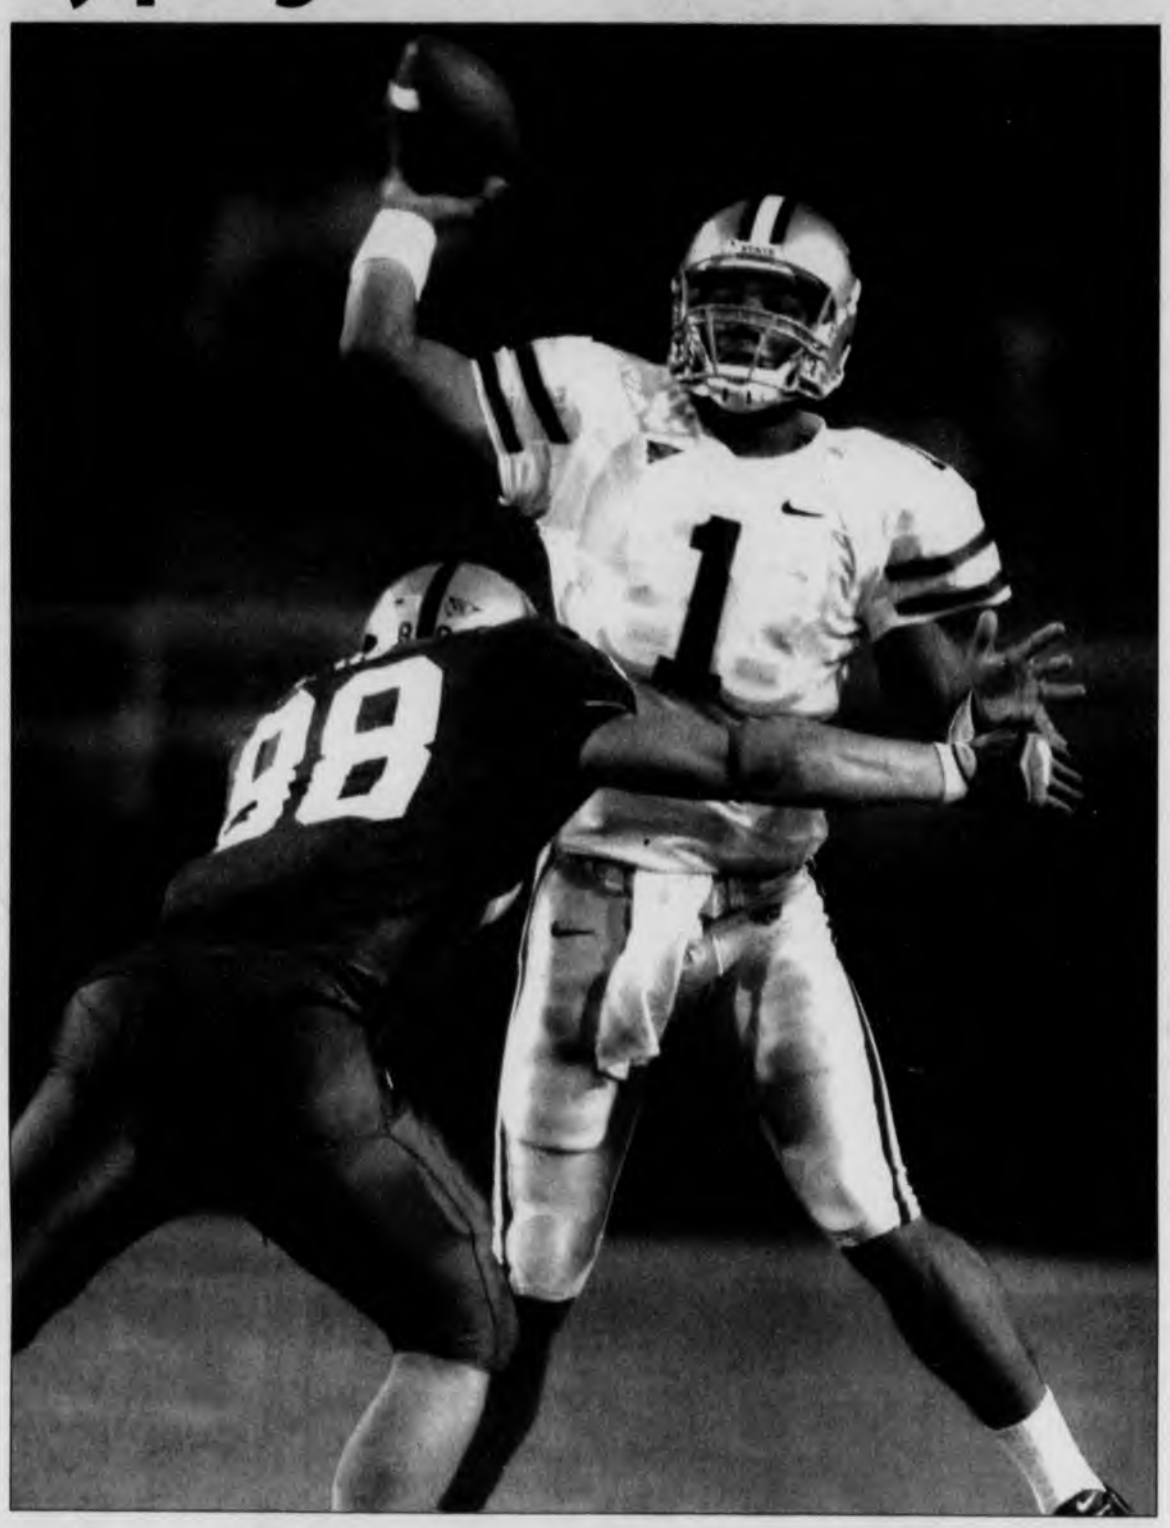
Three of the turnovers occurred inside the Bears' 25-yard line. Senior running back Thomas Clayton and wide receiver Yamon Figurs both fumbled inside the 10-yard line, and Freeman threw one of his three interceptions from the 24-yard line.

When coach Ron Prince met reporters for the post-game press conference he did not use any of his usual clichés. His message took seven minutes, even shorter than his interview after last week's loss to Louisville.

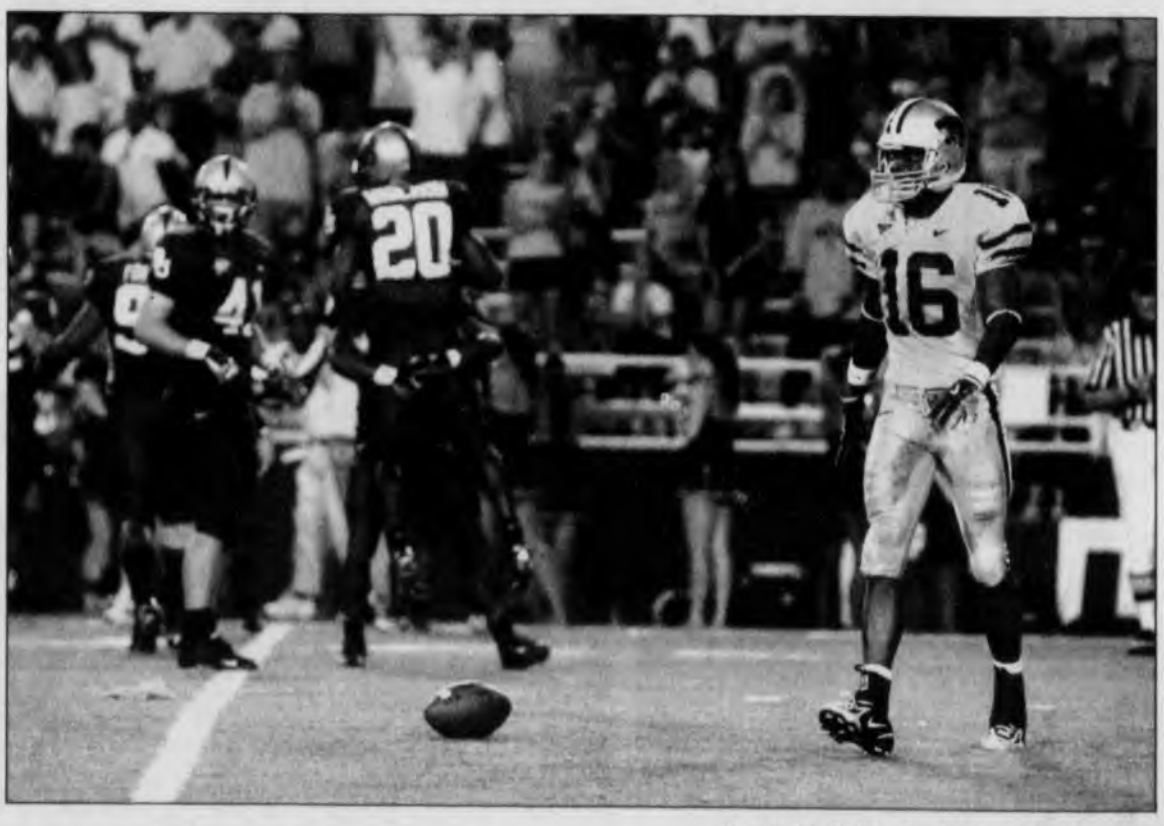
"The next 48 hours for us need to be very introspective and we need to make sure that our house is in order," Prince said. "Whoever the opponent is right now is immaterial. It's a matter of us being able to execute our offense."

Freeman, a true freshman, replaced senior Dylan Meier at halftime. Since throwing a 44-yard touchdown pass in the fourth quarter of a 23-7 win over Marshall, Meier has completed 25-of-55 passes without a touchdown.

In the second half, Freeman was 11-of-33 for 196 yards and three interceptions. However, Freeman's 55- and 68-yard completions are both bigger gains than the 44-yard completion that is Meier's longest of the year.



Prince said Freeman will be quarterback for the "foreseeable future."



"When you come on the road, you have to be able to execute when you have people open," Prince said. "We just felt that we had to make sure that we could do that."

When questioned about being demoted to the second string for Saturday's game against Oklahoma State, Meier asked to hear the question a second time. In fact, none of the players interviewed after the game said Prince had notified them about the quarterback switch.

"It's Coach's call," Meier said. "I got to be ready when he calls my number."

Freeman will make the first start of his collegiate career Saturday against Oklahoma State, making him the first true freshman quarterback to start a Big 12 Conference game this season. Freeman has completed 14-of-47 passes this year for 214 yards and four interceptions.

Top: True-freshman quarterback Josh Freeman throws a pass before being hit by Baylor's Jason Lamb during the second half Saturday. Freeman was announced by coach Ron Prince as the starting quarterback for the "foreseeable future."
Above: Yamon Figurs walks off the field as members of the Baylor defense celebrate a fumble recovery during the third quarter.

Freeman brings fresh start

Josh Freeman is the man now, and it's about time.

K-State football coach Ron Prince announced after the 17-3 loss at Baylor Saturday that the true freshman would take over as the starting quarterback for the "foreseeable future" for struggling senior Dylan Meier.

CEDRIQUE FLEMMING

Prince is making the correct move, because Meier has not shown improvement after five games, and Freeman needs game experience sometime.

I understand Prince not wanting to start a true freshman in the Big 12 Conference opener, especially on the road, but now the Wildcats come back home to Snyder Family Stadium this Saturday to take on Oklahoma State (3-1), and Freeman will have a friendly crowd on his side.

So far in this young season, Meier has said he is trying to improve, and he has faith that the offense will get on track, but I'm not seeing it.

Meier's inaccuracy and inability to find the open wide receiver continues to be a problem. He doesn't have trouble hitting his tight ends with a pass, but the ball seems to land consistently either 5 yards in front or 5 yards over the head of his receivers when he throws them the ball.

Meier is completing 50 percent of his passes, and he has thrown more interceptions (four) than touchdowns (three).

The Wildcat offense is struggling to put together any kind of consistent drives, and maybe a change of quarterback is exactly what this team needs.

Freeman brings a different dimension to an offense that ranks 88th in the country: a vertical passing game. He showcased that dimension against Baylor while playing the entire second half after Prince benched Meier.

Freeman had a 68-yard pass to Yamon Figurs and a 55-yard throw to Jermaine Moreira, while Meier's longest pass this season was a 44-yard touchdown pass to Moreira against Marshall. Together, Figurs and Moreira finished with 179 yards receiving, their highest combined total this season.

Freeman finished the game 11-of-33 for 196 yards and three interceptions. Meier had the same number of completions, but for only 100 yards.

As Freeman progresses as a quarterback, he will get better at reading defenses and will limit his interception count, so don't be scared by those three picks he threw against Baylor.

Meier doesn't have the ability to throw the ball deep down the field because of his surgically repaired shoulder, which has been a problem all season and is why Freeman is now the leader of the offense.

Opposing defenses can stack the line of scrimmage and shut down the K-State running game because Meier doesn't threaten to go deep. With Freeman at the helm, defenses will have to respect his arm strength, and this should spread out the defense and open up a decent running game for Thomas Clayton.

A respectable running game equals more time of possession, which equals more opportunities to score.

Get ready for the beginning of a new era in Wildcat football. Freeman will struggle the first few games, but he should start to become the quarterback K-State fans hope he can be.

Analysis

Wildcats play same error-filled game in new venue

By Austin Meek
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

WACO, Texas – K-State's 17-3 loss at Baylor came down to execution. This mistake-ridden game featured nine turnovers, 16 penalties, 19 punts and 63 combined rushing yards.

For K-State, it was the same story in a different venue. Turnovers, penalties and a non-existent running game.

TURNOVERS

This game pivoted on two critical turnovers. The first came late in the first quarter with the game still scoreless. Thomas Clayton coughed up the football at Baylor's 10-yard line, and the Wildcats squandered a golden opportunity to seize the early lead.

"We were in position to put some points on the board, and I shot myself in the foot, shot my team in the foot," Clayton said.

The second fatal turnover came in the third quarter, with K-State trying to claw back from a 14-3 deficit. Quarterback Josh Freeman connected with Yamon Figurs on a long pass play. Baylor's Todd James stripped the ball from Figurs 10 yards shy of the end zone, and the Bears recovered.

PENALTIES

K-State was penalized 11 times for 84 yards, while Baylor drew just five yellow flags. Four of K-State's penalties were illegal blocks on the punt return unit.

"I felt like in the kicking game we were out-prepared and out-coached," coach Ron Prince said. "To have four or five penalties on the special teams unit is absolutely inexcusable."

RUNNING GAME

Prince called K-State's running game "nonexistent." The Wildcats actually out-gained Baylor on the ground, but neither developed rhythm. Baylor amassed 18 yards on 19 carries, while the Wildcats gained 45 yards on 21 attempts.

The offensive line struggled, but Prince said blocking wasn't the only factor.

"I think (the problem) is in a lot of areas," he said. "It's just the complete execution of how we're doing things."

Rolling Stones perform in Kansas for 1st time in Wichita's largest concert

By Parker Rome

Mick Jagger, lead singer of The Rolling Stones, sings "It's Only Rock'n Roll (But I Like It)" Sunday night at Cessna Stadium in Wichita.

WICHITA – The British Invasion exploded across the United States in the early 1960s. British bands like The Beatles, The Rolling Stones and The Kinks took over American airwaves and venues.

While these bands were popular in the United States, none of them crossed Kansas' borders to perform a concert until last weekend.

On Sunday, more than 40 years since the invasion, Kansas played host to one of the British bands for the first time, as The Rolling Stones played at Cessna Stadium in Wichita.

"It's great to be here," said Keith Richards, Rolling Stones' guitarist, between songs. "It only took us 40 years."

More than 30,000 fans made their way inside Cessna Stadium to attend the concert that recently has been dubbed the biggest in Wichita history.

"It's been said that it was legendary in terms of bringing that kind of entertainment to Wichita," said Lynn Deckinger, communications manager of the Greater Wichita Convention and Visitors Bureau.

It took no time for Wichita residents to gear up for the concert after it was announced. Many hotels and buses were booked for the night of the concert, Decker said. Buses were used to transport people to the concert from off-site locations, as the stadium's capacity was nearly tripled for the event.

"It's kicka-- that they're here, because, guess what? I don't have to drive however many miles to see them this time," Bruce Blank, Wichita resident, said. "I'm terribly excited to see them tonight. Not to mention, I get to wear my pants."

Blank, who was seeing the band for the sixth time, said he has worn the same pair of one-of-a-kind, custom-dyed cotton pants to every Rolling Stones concert he has attended since 1973.

The concert was the 100th stop on the "A Bigger Bang Tour," which has shattered the North American tour revenue record.

Black Rebel Motorcycle Club opened the concert.

A nine-story stage at one end of the field held Richards, singer Mick Jagger, guitarist Ron Wood and drummer Charlie Watts, and provided 240 VIP ticket-holders on-stage seats above the band. A 50-foot screen broadcast every move made by the aging performers and gave everyone in attendance a chance to count the wrinkles on Richards' forehead.

Fireworks, pyrotechnics and inflatable lips large enough to cover the massive screen accented the band's performance.

The Rolling Stones made an effort to satisfy concert-goers seated in every corner of the stadium. A little more than half way through the set, band members abandoned their colossal stage and rode on a second stage that traveled to the center of the arena to perform three songs, giving those farther away a better look.

Jagger and the Rolling Stones played a one-verse cover of Glen Campbell's "Wichita Lineman" special for those in attendance.

The fourth and final leg of The Rolling Stones' tour will end Nov. 11 in Honolulu.

'Ugly Betty' debuts on ABC with pretty ratings

New York (Hollywood Reporter) — "Ugly Betty" was ever-so-pretty with ratings Thursday, which competed strongly against CBS' "Survivor" to become the most-watched new show this season.

For the night, CBS won in total viewers but was edged out by ABC in the coveted adults 18-49 demographic. CBS also had the most viewers on Friday, while NBC won in the demo.

"Betty" was beautiful for ABC, with the English-language version of the Spanish-language telenovela about an unattractive office worker delivering 16.3 million viewers and a 5.0 rating/14 share among adults 18-49 in the 8 p.m. hour, according to Nielsen Media Research.

"Survivor" brought in 16.8 million viewers and a 5.9/16 to take the hour, but "Betty" got stronger as its hour went on, jumping 3.3 million viewers and 33 percent in the demo in its second half-hour to beat "Survivor" in viewership after 8:30 p.m.

That led into the rematch at 9 p.m., when "CSI" (23.8 million, 8.0/19) gained ground after last week's upset to win the hour in viewers. But "Grey's Anatomy" (23.5 million, 9.5/23) was hot on its heels in viewers and remained ahead in the demo.

THIS WEEK... A look at events that occurred during this week in history, other bizarre holidays, happenings

TODAY 1955: "The Mickey Mouse Club" premieres

The first series was essentially a variety show for children, with such regular features as a newsreel, a cartoon and a serial, as well as music, talent and comedy segments.

Each day of the week had a specific theme, like "Fun with Music Day." In the serials, teens faced challenges in everyday situations, often overcome by common sense or through the advice of respected elders.

The main cast members were called "Mouseketeers," and they performed in musical and dance numbers, as well as some informational segments.

The show was live for its first four years and was in black and white until 1966. In 1981, CBS shortened the hour-long show to a half-hour.

WEDNESDAY 1970: Janis Joplin dies from drug overdose

On Oct. 4, 1970, rock singer Janis Joplin was found dead of a drug overdose at age 27. Her ashes were cremated in the Westwood Village Memorial Park Cemetery in Westwood, Calif., and her ashes were scattered into the Pacific Ocean.

Born Janis Lyn Joplin on Jan. 19, 1943, she was an American blues-influenced rock singer and occasional songwriter with a highly distinctive voice. Joplin released four albums as the front woman for several bands from 1967 to a posthumous release in 1971.

THURSDAY 1947: 1st televised presidential address

In the first televised White House address, President Harry S. Truman urged Americans to refrain from eating meat on Tuesdays and poultry on Sundays to help starving people in other countries.

FRIDAY 1927: 1st movie with audio

"The Jazz Singer" is a 1927 U.S. movie musical notable for being the first feature-length motion picture with talking sequences. Released by Warner Bros., it was directed by Alan Crosland and starred Al Jolson, who sings five songs. The movie contains only a few minutes worth of dialogue. The rest of the film's soundtrack is instrumental musical accompaniment and sound effects, with most of the dialogue presented through the standard caption cards prevalent in silent movies of the era. The movie opened on Oct. 6, 1927, and its success demonstrated to Hollywood that "talkies" were profitable.

purchased, and most of it is still used by the department, according to a K-State Research and Extension report.

Sarah Evert, graduate student in agronomy, gave presentations about the crop garden during the agronomy field day at North Farm. Evert explained the uses of crops like sunn hemp, rice, cotton and guar.

"When you buy ice cream, and it's held together in a ball, it's because guar is used as a gum," she said.

The crop garden was started as a field-day attraction during the mid-1990s by Gerry Posler, K-State professor of agronomy and department head in 1990-98.

"A lot of people haven't seen a lot of these crops before, so I decided to put them out," said Posler, a K-State faculty member since 1974.

Jim and Scott Dooley, father and son, respectively, also attended Saturday's centennial events.

Jim graduated from K-State in 1972 with a bachelor's degree in agronomy and was a member of the Soils Judging Team.

"I knew I wanted to go back home and farm," said Jim, who owns a farm in Jewell, Kan. "K-State was basically the only farm school around."

Scott, senior in agronomy, is a member of the Soils Judging Team and Wheat State Agronomy Club. He said he aspires to work as a crop consultant someday.

"I mainly (came to K-State) to follow in my dad's footsteps and go home and farm," Scott said.

Jim said the biggest change in the agronomy department has been its move from Waters Hall to Throckmorton Hall. Phase One of Throckmorton was dedicated in 1981, nine years after Jim graduated.

"There's no doubt about (Throckmorton) being a better place," he said. "There's better space and more equipment."

Leah Ferdinand, junior in agronomy, said she came to K-State for a degree in agronomy because it's a field she enjoys, and K-State is a good choice for agriculture. Ferdinand, also a member of the Soils Judging Team and Wheat State Agronomy Club, said she likes the personable students and faculty in the department.

"I feel like I know the other students in the department," said Ferdinand, who grew up on a dairy farm in Reading, Kan. "It's a friendly, helpful department."

Several of the items in the memorabilia display during the open house included the shovel used in the groundbreaking of Throckmorton addition in 1992 and Wheat State Agronomy Club ball caps. Posler said the club started making the hats in the late 1970s, and a different design is chosen each year.

Joslyn Brown | COLLEGIAN

After looking at the sorghum crops, Mitch Tuinstra shows sorghum seeds to Dan Cain, 1950 graduate in agricultural economics, as part of the Agronomy Field Day in the North Farm.

A history book was produced as a permanent record of the department's first 100 years, and the centennial events went well overall, said Gary Pierzynski, professor of agronomy and interim department head.

"The attendance at some events wasn't what we wanted, but those in attendance had a good time," said Pierzynski, who has been at K-State for 17 years. "I think we did justice to the event."

ADDRESS | Provost describes K-State's 'aggressive' action to resolve problems facing higher education repeat it over and over again," Wefald said.

Diversity at K-State also has improved in 20 years, Wefald said.

Today, there are 133 blacks in faculty and administrative ranks, compared to 15 in 1986, Wefald said. Diversity with Hispanics and women in faculty and administration also has increased, he said.

"It's not bad, but we have to improve and be better," Wefald said of the increases.

In his visions for K-State, Wefald said he wants the university to become one of the top land-grant universities – excluding medical schools – in the United States.

"When you set priorities and take some risks, good things happen," he said. "We're going to continue to be a can-do university. We want to continue to get better and better."

PROVOST DUANE NELLIS

Six higher-education associations recently issued a collective list of key challenges facing higher education, Nellis said. These challenges include:

- Expanding access to low-income and minority students
- Keeping college affordable
- Improving learning by utilizing new knowledge and instructional techniques
- Preparing secondary students for higher education
- Increasing accountability for educational outcomes
- Internationalizing the student experience
- Increasing opportunities for life-long education and work-force training
- Continuing enhancements in graduate education and research

K-State administration and faculty members are responding to these changes in several ways, like academic departments establishing their own key areas for improvement, Nellis said.

"In an ever-increasingly globally competitive market, we must respond aggressively to these challenges," he said. "I must say that as we look at Kansas State University ... we're making steady progress in all of these challenges as we continue to be of service to the people of Kansas, and indeed, the citizens of the world."

ROGER ADAMS, FACULTY SENATE PRESIDENT AND RARE BOOKS LIBRARIAN FOR HALE LIBRARY

K-State is not struggling as much in faculty recruitment and retention as other Regents' universities, said Adams, who is in his ninth year at K-State.

"Faculty are the heart of a successful university, and right now, that heart is beating harder than it ever has before in the history of K-State and our sister institutions," he said.

K-State lost 27 faculty members in 2005 and 31 faculty members in 2004, Adams said. There are currently 960 ranked faculty at K-State, but in 1992, there were 1,085, he said.

"Our faculty numbers are down, but the trend is slowing," Adams said. "Yet we simply cannot afford to lose more faculty every year."

Adams said faculty salaries often are blamed for the loss of faculty. Regents chairman Nelson Galle recently listed faculty salaries as the top issue of this year for the Regents, Adams said.

"The message has been very received, but salary isn't the only thing hindering us," he said. "My counterparts at the other Regents institutions all report the same frustrations. But I want to issue a challenge to everyone today – help us figure it out and let K-State take the lead to overcome the problem."

Jackie Spears, associate professor of secondary education, said Adams highlighted what K-State can do to improve faculty recruitment and retention. She said she also enjoyed Wefald and Nellis' comments on the state of the university.

"President Wefald did an extraordinary job of presenting the bigger picture," said Spears, who served as Faculty Senate president in 2004-05. "He showed what the leadership traits are to move a large university like Kansas State forward."

Volleyball team falters late in loss to No. 8 Texas, extends streak

Despite holding a two game lead over No. 8 Texas Saturday afternoon in Austin, Texas, the K-State women's volleyball team was unable to hold on for the win.

The Wildcats (8-7, 0-5 Big 12) lost 2-3 (30-28, 30-25, 26-30, 16-30, 10-15) and extended their losing streak to six straight matches. They have not won a match since Sept. 9 against Notre Dame.

Sophomore middle blockers Megan Kroeker and Megan Farr led the way for the Wildcats, combining for 26 kills and 11 total blocks. Junior setter Stacey Spiegelberg contributed 47 assists and 18 digs, her third double-double of the season.

After taking the first two games of the match, the Wildcats led the Longhorns (9-4, 4-2 Big 12) 13-6 in game three. However, the Longhorns charged back, and tied the game at 17-17 before eventually winning 30-26.

The Longhorns then held off the Wildcats in the fourth and fifth games to take the match.

PATTERSON AGREES TO 5-YEAR CONTRACT

Women's basketball coach Deb Patterson agreed in principle to a new five-year contract, K-State Director of Intercollegiate Athletics Tim Weiser announced on Sept. 29.

Patterson, who is entering her 11th season this year, is eight wins shy of becoming K-State's all-time leader in wins, surpassing Judy Akers, who coached the Wildcats from 1968-79.

"I am ecstatic about the opportunity to continue leading this great program for the next five years," Patterson said in a news release. "I respect the consistent support of President Wefald, Tim Weiser and our athletics administration and appreciate their commitment to making Kansas State one of the finest women's basketball programs in the country."

Freshman Lindsay Pierson finished second on the team, placing 24th.

TENNIS TEAM RALLIES AFTER ROUGH FIRST DAY

The women's tennis team finished the K-State Invitational tournament this weekend with six singles wins and three doubles wins.

The Wildcats posted just two wins in the first round of singles play on Friday, from junior Tamar Kvaratskhelia and freshman Natasha Vieira.

Saturday proved more successful for the Wildcats, with Kvaratskhelia, junior Viviana Yrureta and sophomore Katerina Kudlackova all posting singles wins against Missouri.

K-State also won three of six doubles matches for the day, with Kudlackova and senior Olga Klimova defeating teams from Missouri and Tulsa, and Yrureta and junior Tereza Prochazkova earning a win against Missouri.

K-State closed out the tournament with a singles win from Yrureta.

ROWING TEAM FINISHES WITH NOVICE 8+ WIN

The K-State women's rowing team finished two teams in the Top-10 in the varsity 8+ head race at the Head of the Oklahoma Regatta on Saturday. The teams advanced to the 500 meter sprints, where the "A" boat finished fourth in heat-one and the "C" boat finished third in heat-two against Texas, Louisville and Kansas.

On Sunday, the Novice 8+ squad won the Collegiate Novice 8+ race by 35 seconds over second-place Kansas. The team also placed two teams in the Top-10 of the Varsity 4+ race on Sunday, but neither finished high enough to advance to the 500 meter sprint.

"For the first time out, it was a good weekend," coach Patrick Sweeney said.

The team's next competition is Oct. 29 at the Head of Iowa Regatta in Iowa City, Iowa.

Apple Day replicates 1800s at Fort Riley

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With more than 1,500 apple pies, a Blackhawk helicopter for visitors to climb on and multiple demonstrations and displays, Fort Riley's annual open house and Apple Day festivities entertained visitors Saturday at Cavalry Parade Field.

"This is going to be the best turnout we've ever had," Staci Roberts, Apple Day pie queen, said.

Fresh apple pies cost $8 for a whole pie, or $2 per slice, Roberts said.

Proceeds went to the Historical and Architectural Society of Fort Riley to help with community assistance and renovations to the historical buildings at the fort.

Roberts stood outside the Custer House, where tours of the museum were offered.

Rooms were furnished to replicate the home of a family who would have lived at Fort Riley in the late 1800s, and demonstrations were given outside of political rallies for Bleeding Kansas, in which a debate took place between costumed characters as to whether Kansas should be a free or slave state, and a debate about women's right to vote.

Women wearing 1800-period dresses and men in top hats and dressed as Southern gentlemen debated the issues.

"Women have rights. We have been downtrodden all along," said a woman who played the role of Sarah Robinson of Valley Falls, Kan.

Also included was a debate about Prohibition, the outlawing of alcohol.

Prohibition and women's rights are intertwined, Robinson said.

Lyndsey Born | COLLEGIAN

Diane Bernheimer, resident of Topeka, listens to Michelle Martin, resident of Fort Scott, Kan., and Tim Rues, resident of Lecompton, Kan., as they re-enact a debate over women's rights during Fort Riley's annual open house and Apple Day festivities Saturday.

"Have you ever been married to a drunkard?" she asked the audience.

An actress who played the role of Clarina Nichols, resident of Fort Scott and editor of the Quindaro Express, agreed and said alcohol was responsible for creating widows and orphans everywhere.

Children and adults took turns riding in a cart pulled by two mules, Mary Jane and Patricia, and watched displays of military working dogs.

Children participated in the military obstacle course and learned a lesson at the same time, Clinton Reeves, Fort Riley soldier, said.

"We're doing it, so they respect what we do, and vice versa," he said.

The day took a solemn turn with the rededication of the Global War on Terrorism monument, which was built to honor the soldiers from Fort Riley who have died since the war began.

Cavalry officers sat at attention on their horses as Col. Ty Smith spoke about the monument designed to replicate the World Trade Center twin towers and the Pentagon.

Smith read from a poem by Archibald MacLeish titled "The Young Dead Soldiers Do Not Speak," saying the monument was built so no one would forget the sacrifices made by the soldiers in the war.

"We leave you our deaths," the poem read. "Give them their meaning ... 'We were young,' they say. 'We have died. Remember us.'" donate on Tuesday. He said he has been giving blood since he came to K-State because he is aware of the need for blood.

"And I've got more," he said.

Larissa Noonan, graduate student in business administration, said she has donated about 15 times since she turned 18.

"I know there are a lot of people that are afraid of needles," she said. "I hate them myself."

But she said she doesn't pay attention to the needle, thinking instead of many lives her blood will save.

Allen Miller, senior in finance, said he's afraid of needles, which keeps him from donating.

"I'm frightened by them and just can't look away," he said.

Miller said he's never donated and doesn't know his blood type.

"If I knew I have O negative, I would try donating, but I would probably pass out," he said.

Last year's volunteers donated 699 pints of blood. Usually 30 percent of volunteers can't donate because their iron count is too low.

To give blood, a person must be at least 16 years old, weigh at least 110 pounds and not have donated blood in the past 56 days.

"Before donating, make sure to have a good meal and plenty to drink," Ingalls said, "because it's important to have enough iron and vitamin C."

Stephanie Lavin, junior in marketing, said she had her blood tested for the cross country team last year and was told that her iron count was too low. She was put on iron supplements.

"I might give it a shot this year," she said. "But I'll need to get my iron checked first."

Roughly 15 blood drives take place each day in Kansas and northern Oklahoma. Noonan said on-campus blood drives are more convenient.

"It is easier for students, and they usually give it a shot," she said.

Students who donate will receive a 125th-anniversary Red Cross T-shirt. To volunteer, e-mail Kristi Ingalls at IngallsK@usa.redcross.org or call (785) 456-9773. Walk-in donors are welcome.

Smoke

■ BAN: Commissioners passed a smoking ordinance Tuesday that prohibits smoking in public places except between 9 p.m and 5 a.m., at bars, and at certain types of businesses.

By Megan Moser
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Four hours and only one opportunity for a smoke break?

Tuesday night's City Commission meeting was a nightmare for smokers and nonsmokers alike, as commissioners failed to pass a complete ban on smoking in public places in Manhattan, instead opting for a partial ban.

Dozens of extra chairs were set up outside the City Commission Room to accommodate more than 100 people in attendance for the first reading of the smoking legislation.

Commissioners discussed three potential ordinances ranging from a ban in all public places and work places at all times to banning smoking only in restaurants during certain hours.

They approved the second ordinance, banning smoking in public places and work places with a long list of exceptions. Patrons may smoke in restaurants between the hours of 9 p.m. and 5 a.m. Bars, or "drinking establishments," are exempt.

Under this ordinance, smoking also is permitted in private residences, designated hotel rooms, retail tobacco stores, outdoor areas, country clubs and lodges, billiard or pool halls, bowling alleys and bingo halls.

STUDENTS

Twenty-four members of the community spoke at the meeting, including high school students, doctors, business owners and K-State's student body president, Lucas Maddy. The Student Governing Association passed a resolution last week supporting a total smoking ban in Manhattan.

"There would be no noticeable effect, at least for college students, in enforcing a 9-5 smoking ban," Maddy said. "In my opinion, the aim of policy is to effect a benefit – a noticeable benefit. If there isn't one, I think there isn't much use in adopting an ordinance."

Tanner Bannion, governmental relations chair, also spoke.

"Municipalities have made great strides in public health over the years," he said. "We have things like mandatory sewage systems and fire codes. I look at this like this. If we're trying to protect public health, I don't look at it as more of an invasion."

Ten people spoke in favor of the total ban before one of a handful of people spoke out against it.

"Every building has an ashtray, and every ashtray has butts in it," said George Hodges, non-traditional student and freshman in social science. "I'm a smoker. I really appreciate that other folks don't like smoking. But first, it will start at the door. In a month, well, you have to go 25 feet from the door. Then it's 50 feet from the door. Next thing you know, you'll be out back.

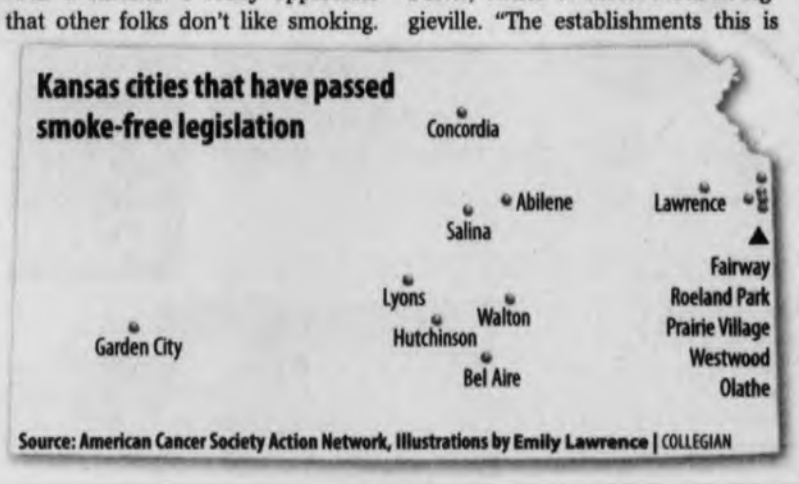
"They're taking people's rights in incremental steps. Don't let them do it."

RESIDENTS

Others who opposed the ban said it takes away the rights of business owners.

"What I want to say is quit dancing around the term 'public places' – we're talking about bars," said Billy Porter, owner of Porter's Bar in Aggieville. "The establishments this is going to affect are some of mine."

Porter said the high school students who spoke at the meeting would not be harmed by a more lenient smoking ordinance.



"They're not allowed in my establishments. They're not adults yet. When they turn 21, I will welcome them with open arms. But it's still an adult's choice," he said.

Many people who supported the first ordinance said they did not want to see the second or third ordinances passed.

Kristen Bruce, health initiatives specialist with the American Cancer Society, said the commission should get rid of the two "fake" ordinances and vote for the one that was "simple, strong, enforceable and fair."

"If you will not support a compre-

Proposed Bans

Ordinance 1
Bans smoking in all public places and places of employment, regardless of size or type, with only four exceptions. This is the easiest to enforce and the most effective in protecting public health.
Smoking is permitted in the following places:
1. Private residences
2. Designated hotel rooms
3. Retail tobacco stores
4. Outdoor areas

Ordinance 2
Prohibits smoking in public places and places of employment, but includes an extensive list of exceptions and a waiver/licensing process. Allows smoking in restaurants between 9 p.m. and 5 a.m. Drinking establishments with less than 30 percent of total sales from food are exempt by waiver. This ordinance is the most difficult to enforce and only partially improves public health.
Smoking is permitted in the following places:
1. Private residences
2. Designated hotel rooms
3. Retail tobacco stores
4. Outdoor areas
5. Class A and Class B clubs, like country clubs and lodges
6. Billiards clubs
7. Bowling alleys
8. Bingo halls
9. Sole proprietors

Ordinance 3
Only allows smoking in restaurants between the hours of 9 p.m. and 5 a.m. so it is only intended to protect diners. Drinking establishments are exempt.
Smoking is permitted in the following places:
1. Billiard and pool halls
2. Bingo halls
3. Bowling alleys
4. Class A and Class B clubs
5. Private dining areas or banquet rooms

Students come together for Multicultural Pride Day

By Rebecca Vitztum
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A diverse group of high school students congregated at the K-State Student Union for a crash course in culture.

Multicultural Pride Day for high school juniors, seniors and their parents was held Tuesday on campus.

The event was an opportunity for people of different races to get together and learn about college life. It allowed students to see what options they have in college, and find out what it's like to be a multicultural student on campus.

"These are students who want to come to college and have not had the access to the knowledge of how one gets to college, and what it takes to be a successful college student," Anita Cortez, developing scholars programmer, said. "It gives a diverse group of students contacts and resources about how to access higher education."

Along with bringing diverse groups together, this special event proves to be a help in the recruiting process for the university. Fall enrollment numbers, reported to the Kansas Board of Regents, listed student diversity at an all-time high.

"Taking a look around at how many students are here, one would hope that it would help in the recruiting of students at K-State," Cortez said. "The university showed off all the wonderful programs it has to offer students. It is known as a family oriented university, which really grabs the students' attention and makes them feel comfortable."

The students and parents had the opportunity to discuss different academic interests, pick from a variety of sessions that talk about college success, information on how to choose a major and information on scholarships and financial aid.

Students said the sessions proved to be helpful for the students in deciding their future and how to succeed in college.

"Everyone was very nice and helpful on campus," Larry Hayes, high school senior, said. "I feel like the administrators were pretty straightforward and helpful about how to do well after high school. I got to tour the campus and see what different colleges the university has to offer."

The parents and students were served lunch which included entertainment by multicultural student groups, a student panel and prizes. Different African American and Latino fraternities performed dances and gave information about what potential students can be involved in. Lunch was followed by more campus touring and a look at students' residential life.

Lindsay Whitehead, sophomore in architecture, looks at the pottery in the Potters Guild sale Tuesday afternoon in Bosco Student Plaza.

Potters Guild funds travel with sale of students' work

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Joshua Long has devoted time to creating ceramics like mugs and jars solely to sell them this week.

But he said he won't miss his artwork.

Long, senior in art with an emphasis in ceramics, is selling the items in the Potters Guild sale.

He examined one of his items for sale, a tan-colored mug, while waiting for customers.

"I think the handle is nice, and I kind of wanted to make it look earthy, which is why I gave it ridges," he said. "It was a change for me because usually I do fairly clean work."

Long's mug was one of many student-made items, including bowls, cups and pots, in the pottery sale Tuesday in the Bosco Student Plaza at the start of the sale that runs until Thursday.

Cheryl Hammons, senior in art, said the ceramics sell for $5-$50 and include ceramics from students' assignments, as well as items specifically made to sell.

The makers of the art set the price, and they receive 70 percent of the profit, while the remaining 30 percent goes to the Pottery Guild for the National Council on Education for the Ceramic Arts conference in Louisville, Ky. About 15 members of the guild will attend the conference, and money made from the pottery sale goes to pay travel expenses for the conference, Hammons said.

"Most of the items are functional pieces because functional items sell better, although most of the graduate students created items that are more sculpture-based this semester."

Cheryl Hammons
SENIOR IN ART

"Most of the items are functional pieces because functional items sell better, although most of the graduate students created items that are more sculpture-based this semester," she said.

Most of the items being sold are in earth-toned colors because the chemicals used to make the neutral glaze for the colors are cheaper, she said.

Hammons said she is a functional potter and has been potting for eight years. She now uses her own items at home in place of commercial items.

She said she does most of her potting on campus in the studio space, which is available to students enrolled in the ceramics classes.

However, Hammons said creating the ceramics can be expensive because of the costs of the supplies needed.

Long said he is also a functional potter and became interested in pursuing ceramics because of one of his professors.

"I started pottery in middle school and didn't think there was a possibility of making a career out of it until college," he said.

Members of the Potters Guild include undergraduate and graduate students, and members are required to pay a membership fee.

Tim Sidorfsky, junior in physical science, said he considered buying a piece that resembled mushrooms, which he thought was more of a decoration.

He said he has bought items at the sale before and stopped by this sale to look for possible Christmas gifts.

"I thought I could buy for some people that I didn't want to spend a lot on if I saw something that snagged my attention," Sidorfsky said.

Pottery sale
The sale will continue from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. today and Thursday in Bosco Student Plaza.

Sexual appetite

Human design, common sense declare sex designed for procreation within marital union

KODY COOPER

Trying to find a virgin on a college campus these days is like trying to find a libertine at a Star Trek convention.

The 22-year-old virgin is nearly extinct in the United States. They exist now only in isolated pockets of strange fundamentalists and fanatics who dogmatically convene for worship every Sunday – at Star Trek conventions.

How did this happen?

Ironically, both Sexdom and Trekdom have their roots in the "seminal decade" – the 1960s. In this decade, both the sexual liberationists and Captain Kirk were leading a mission "to go boldly where no man has gone before."

While Kirk led his crew into uncharted space, the sexual liberationists led us into a culture in which marital union and reproduction were severed from sex.

Forty years later, the results of Sexdom are tallied. Today, the variety of contraceptives we have to choose from is rivaled only by the number of STDs we have to choose from. Condoms and Chlamydia are as commonplace as syndicated television.

The initial thrill of sexual "freedom" is gone. Like Star Trek reruns, libertinism is nothing more than a string of incessant banalities numbing the mind to the point of meaninglessness.

Sex severed from the procreative marital bond has lost its essence. In reckless pursuit of it, we have lost ours.

How so? Quite simply, we have believed the lie that sex is for pleasure – the idea that satisfying the sexual appetite is the purpose of sex. Common sense declares this is farce. (Here, I am indebted to C.S. Lewis and J. Budziszewski.)

Appetites are impulses directed at concrete physical pleasures. However, appetites are not alone sufficient to direct us to the good. We must employ a little common sense in light of human design.

Take hunger. This appetite is directed at the concrete pleasure realized when we eat. Yet, eating is not for pleasure. Eating is designed for bodily nourishment. Thus, the appetite of hunger provides a motive for eating. Realized pleasure is subordinate to achieving bodily nutrition.

Just imagine if eating were for pleasure. Our lives would consist of endless gorging sessions alternating between Hunan and Cold Stone, pausing only to buy bigger and bigger flowery muumuus to cover up our Homerian fat bodies.

Eating for pleasure leads only to disorder and a whale waistline.

Neither is sex for pleasure. As hunger is a motive directing us to take in nutrition, sexual appetite is a motive directing us toward procreative marital union. Realized pleasure is subordinate to this end.

This is not difficult to understand. It is the purpose for which we are designed. Consider how extraordinarily the sexes complement each other.

While we can perform many natural functions alone (digestion, seeing, hearing), none of us can procreate alone. Our design proclaims that only in the union of the sexual organs of one man and one woman can natural procreation occur.

In this union, two selves give fully to one another to become "one flesh." Accounting for infertile couples, it is only in this unimpeded, unrestrained procreative-friendly union that the purpose of sex is fulfilled.

Reject it at your own dismay. Intentionally non-marital and non-reproductive sex is ultimately disintegrative or selfish. It will make an instrument of either your members (dividing yourself) or your partner (making him or her into mere means).

It is time that we go boldly where we have already been – to a common sense understanding of sex.

Banks, insurers owe black people reparations for past injustices

ZACHARY T. ECKELS

My ancestors were true believers in the American dream. They worked hard and complained little. They knew there was no such thing as a free lunch and proudly did as much as it took to afford their next meal. Because of this, I inherited a privileged life.

One week ago, lawyers asked a federal appeals court to revive a case to compensate those who were refused this same opportunity. This landmark reparations case they're trying to restore would require 17 insurers and banks to publicize and pay for their roles in the country's slave trade.

The insurers and banks targeted include JP Morgan Chase and Company, Aetna Inc. and Bank of America. The accusations are that these companies not only loaned money for slaves, but also, in some cases, insured, transported and even owned them.

According to an Associated Press article, a few corporations already have come clean about this, mostly because some state laws and cities now require them to do so.

JP Morgan Chase now admits that before slavery was abolished in 1865, it owned 1,200 slaves in Louisiana and accepted 13,000 others as collateral. After inflation, that totals to at least $850 million profited off other human beings.

But don't worry, with its new $5 million scholarship program for black students in Louisiana, it will take only 170 years to make up for the financial side of its wrong.

People who oppose the case point out that the descendants of slaves weren't actually harmed by these companies. But just like these corporations hide their pasts, this argument shuts itself off from the world and pretends racism doesn't exist.

We must remember that the first way to deal with a problem is to admit we have it. Yes, we've made slow progress over the years in this area, but we've come nowhere close to where we should be.

Black people still are paid lower salaries, going to prison more often, receiving worse health care and dying at younger ages. I don't think it takes a genius to figure out where these trends originated.

In fact, the only argument I've heard against this case with which I agree is that it won't make up for the wrongs done during slavery. It won't. But just as my ancestors had to work for their lunch, it's time for these banks and insurers to pay for theirs.

Partial-smoking ban unrealistic, offers no protection for employees, patrons

No smoking – until after 9 p.m.

We think the City Commission's decision to pass a partial-smoking ban in Manhattan is unrealistic.

The ban only applies to restaurants in the city, and smoking is permitted only from 9 p.m. to 5 a.m. Bars are exempt from the ban.

By allowing smoking during evening hours, the commission puts bar and restaurant employees and patrons at risk because they still are exposed to second-hand smoke. Even those who frequent restaurants during the day are at risk of second-hand smoke exposure because the smoke lingers from the night before.

The partial ban is no different from having smoking and non-smoking sections in restaurants. To clarify, the partial-smoking ban is like having a designated urinating section in a swimming pool. Regardless of the boundaries, the urine still travels to the rest of the pool. In the same way, smoke travels from the smoking to the non-smoking section.

In addition, the ban does not protect business owners, because they do not have the decision to prohibit smoking on their own. Local government regulates when patrons can and cannot smoke.

The City Commission needs to re-evaluate its decision and employ an all-or-nothing mentality.

Either ban smoking completely, or don't ban it at all.

But don't settle for middle ground.

1st 'Manhattan Matters' TV news program to air today

By Megan Molitor
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The first "Manhattan Matters" program of the semester will be filmed and aired today.

The show is a news-magazine program that is directed, produced, reported and anchored by students, according to the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications Web site.

"We'll have our crew call at 2:30 that day, but we probably won't begin shooting until 3:30," Tyler Traxson, senior in mass communications, said. "Anyone is welcome to come to our studio in Bob Dole Hall to take pictures."

Traxson is part of the crew that produces the show, and he has been involved for three years.

"I think we're becoming prepared," he said. "There has been a lot to learn and a complex process. After every show, we critique it, while at the same time preparing for the next week."

This week's show will feature new area businesses, like Best Buy. It also will show the K-State water-ski team, fundraisers and public safety on campus, Traxson said.

"We try and get a wide range of stories, not only from K-State, but from the community, too," he said.

Stephanie Montgomery, junior in mass communications, said the crew, which produces the show as part of a video news production class, takes turns at each position.

"It varies from week to week," Montgomery said. "Sometimes you'll produce, anchor or whatever. This week I'm a reporter."

"Manhattan Matters"
The show airs on KSTB Cox cable channel 8 and on campus channel 10 6:30-7 p.m. and 9:30-10 p.m.

She said each show does not have a specific focus, but instead producers give everyone an individual package to develop. Then they put all pieces together each week.

"The reason that we're just now starting to begin our shows is because the first half of the class is a 'how-to,'" Montgomery said. "We learn all of the details, then the second half of the semester, we film the actual show each week."

Bambi Landholm, assistant professor of journalism, oversees the show but could not be reached for comment.

Manhattan Emergency Shelter assists homeless, unemployed

By Wesley Dickson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When local citizens have no where else to turn, Manhattan Emergency Shelter Inc. can help.

MESI has helped many Manhattan residents since it opened its doors in 1985. MESI provides housing for men, women and families. However, MESI does not provide shelter for children who are not accompanied by their parents or if they are emancipated. They also provide meals for the residents of the shelter.

Executive Director Mandy Chapman Semple said the shelter provides individual case management. MESI's main goal is to return families to a point at which they can help themselves, she said. The shelter helps clients through hurdles that come up on the way back to their previous lives.

"We like to address the clients' individual needs whether its transportation, housing or daycare," Chapman Semple said.

The shelter's clients include those suffering from displacement, mental illness, substance abuse and loss of employment. A large number of clients with mental illnesses lost their jobs before their mental illness set in. Other clients who lost their jobs simply could not find work before they spent their entire savings and lost their homes.

Manhattan Emergency Shelter funding
29 percent: City of Manhattan Social Service funds
23 percent: Riley County United Way, 19 percent fundraising
10 percent: Housing and Urban Development Emergency Shelter Grant
10 percent: other
5 percent: Riley County
4 percent: Kansas Victims of Crime Act Grant and private donations

MESI has not seen many clients who have lost their homes due to fire or other natural disasters. Emily Wagner, client services director, said in the six years she has worked at MESI, there have been only two families that have needed assistance due to those circumstances.

Chapman Semple said many people do not realize the difference between rural and urban homelessness.

When families in rural communities lose their homes, they can be forced to double up with other families.

The current shelter can handle 26 people at one time. It hopes to build a new shelter capable of serving 52 people. The next focus will be transition houses where people can move from needing help to helping themselves.

In 2005, 290 individuals accessed MESI for the first time. That same year the shelter responded to more than 500 incidents of homelessness, a record number of individuals and families and a 10-percent increase from 2004.

Melanie Landis, staff liaison and accounting supervisor, said the city of Manhattan contributed about $64,000 to MESI's general funds last year through the city's Social Service funds.

Chapman Semple said MESI looks to greatly increase the number of people it has assisted this year. She said it will probably have to turn away more than 200 people this year simply because there is not enough room.

TO THE EDITOR

Columnist must learn importance of respect for elders; lack thereof is Kansas' problem

Editor,

Could someone please explain to me when good writing became articles centered around bashing the older population? The article written by Grant Reichert, titled "Columnist shows just how bad popular author's examples really are," was nothing short of offensive.

While I am sure your readers understand the opinion page is just that, the writers and editors on your staff should give more thought to what they decide to print. This article, which was supposed to be a critique of the speech given by Thomas Frank, was nothing of the sort, but merely a disrespectful waste of space. More than half of the article was used to direct distasteful comments toward the older population of our society.

What is really wrong with Kansas, and even more generally, American society, is people like this writer who know nothing of the importance of respecting others. Maybe he should have paid a little more attention to the "aged (who) are always raising moral non-issues" and learned to respect everyone, including those who are older than you.

Student Health Advisory Committee created to hear students' comments, concerns on Lafene

Editor,

I am the chair of the Student Health Advisory Committee, and on behalf of our members, I am expressing our concern over the Sept. 25 article about Lafene Health Center. I point out that we employ licensed physicians, many of whom are board-certified in their specialties and all of whom care about the well-being of the patients they treat. Lafene is accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Healthcare Organizations, an agency that has high standards for quality care and management.

It is true that Lafene can't provide health care in all specialty areas; if we did, student fees would greatly increase. Lafene staff can provide the kind of healthcare you would expect to receive from your hometown doctor; we're just a little closer. A great portion of each student's privilege fee goes to Lafene to subsidize the cost of student care. In turn, Lafene works with the university to make K-State a healthier campus. I would urge the student body not to downgrade the services they are, in fact, financially supporting. The Student Health Advisory Committee was created for many purposes, including the responsibility to listen to students' thoughts about Lafene and to help Lafene improve its current services. We read every letter and every comment card given to us.

If anyone has any concern about Lafene's services, please let us know.

French parliamentary panel recommends end of smoking in enclosed public places

By Jamey Keaten
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

PARIS – French lawmakers are trying to make France's smoky cafes a thing of the past.

A parliamentary panel called Tuesday for a government ban on smoking in enclosed public areas within a year – and floated the idea of "hermetically sealed" rooms for those who want to smoke.

Although just a recommendation that leaves government with the final say, a ban would send a shock through France's smoker-friendly culture where cigarettes have long been identified with cool, and where smoky bistros are still redoubts of Paris' intelligentsia.

Even the French presidency's Web site shows a photo of a young President Jacques Chirac in a James Dean-like pose with a cigarette in his mouth.

Health Minister Xavier Bertrand has said smoking-related illness kills 66,000 people every year in France. An estimated 5,000 of those deaths are from second-hand smoke.

"The status quo is not acceptable," said an extract of the parliamentary panel's report, which was to be made public today.

The government is expected to decide by mid-October on the panel request for a ban in cafes, offices, schools, restaurants, airports, train stations and other enclosed public spaces by next September.

In a symbolic gesture, the president of the parliament's lower house said its tobacco shop will close Jan. 1. Jean-Louis Debre said the chamber should go further and set an example by outlawing smoking in its building.

If the ban takes effect, France would become the latest European country to join the anti-smoking bandwagon – Ireland, Spain, Italy and Britain have adopted similar measures.

In the United States, 17 states and at least 474 municipalities have enacted smoking bans in restaurants, bars and other workplaces, according to the California-based Americans for Nonsmokers' Rights. Hawaii begins a ban in November, and Washington, D.C., is going smokeless in January.

The French panel advised the government to adopt a ban by governmental decree, because parliament's "heavy load" of business in coming months might make it difficult to legislate. Bertrand has said he backs a decree to avoid political fallout for lawmakers with elections next spring.

The panel also floated the idea of partitioned zones for smokers. It described the areas as "hermetically sealed spaces equipped with smoke-extraction systems and strict health rules." But in places like restaurants, table service would not be allowed inside them to protect the health of waiters.

Many hoteliers, bistro owners and restaurateurs vowed a fight. Opponents want some exceptions – like for bars that sell tobacco products.

TRENT SCOTT

Intensity, frequency, duration and technique are all essential aspects to any good lifting routine. They are the foundations on which all strength training programs are built.

However, we often overlook the other necessities in accomplishing our weight room goals: dedication, obligation, encouragement and competition.

These are the unseen requirements of any exercise program, things you can't find in a book or online.

Besides the obvious benefit of safety through spotting, strength training with a partner preserves dedication and obligation.

You are less likely to skip a workout when you know your partner is counting on you to get to the gym, no matter the time or circumstances. There is a mutual understanding between partners, indicating the other is dependent on him or her to successfully complete the workout. Partners keep each other in the weight room.

Partners also encourage each other to complete their lifts and to increase their weights when a lift becomes too easy.

It's easy to give up or quit with the minimum number of repetitions when lifting by yourself. A partner will motivate you to get those last two or three repetitions in every set and to do the exercises in your routine you know are necessary but don't really like.

A partner will force you to go above and beyond in all aspects of your workout, allowing you to use every bit of remaining strength and ultimately build bigger and stronger muscles.

Most importantly, partners provide each other with a little friendly competition.

No one likes to lose, and secretly, we all like to one-up everyone else even when we are good sports about it. You easily can see how lifting with a partner can facilitate increases in strength and definition.

Your partner can bench press 225 pounds five times, so you decide to press it six times. Or maybe you will leave him in the dust and show him how real men can do five reps of 230 pounds.

Maybe your lifting partner has a six-pack. He knows it, you know it, and so does your Training to the point of muscular failure is a great way to stress the muscle fibers for added growth, but this type of lifting can be serious business, especially when using heavy free weights. When attempting to lift heavy weights, it's crucial to find a lifting partner, or spotter, to avoid injury and ensure safety.

A spotter serves the purpose of assisting as needed in order to execute the exercise. When you're filling the role of spotter, there are some key guidelines to remember to promote safety in the weight room.

■ Move all loose plates, barbells and dumbbells away from the area to avoid tripping on them.

■ Communicate with the lifter as to how many repetitions you plan to attempt.

■ Pay attention to your lifter at all times. Avoid checking out that good-looking girl at the cable machine or the cute guy with the heavy dumbbells.

■ Assume proper body position: hands as close to the weighted bar as possible without hindering the lifter's range of motion.

■ Ask the lifter if he or she wants your hands on the bar or not. If so, use one of two appropriate hand grips (closed grip: thumb wraps around the bar).

A) Pronated grip: knuckles up, gripping on top of the bar

B) Supinated grip: palms up, gripping underneath the side of the bar

■ Keep knees slightly bent with your back flat so you are in a safe position to "catch" the bar if necessary. This ensures use of leg power and prevents injury to your back when lifting the weight.

■ Double check to make sure the bar is evenly loaded.

■ Use effective communication.

One word or a short phrase, like "take it," works well for times when the lifter needs the spotter to take the load. Spotters might need to assist in "lift-off." A verbal command or signal needs to be established to ensure both lifter and spotter are ready at the same time. Counting "1, 2, 3, lift" works well.

■ Don't be afraid to offer encouragement. This might help the person being spotted to execute the last few repetitions. Choose your spotter wisely. Pick someone who will keep you focused and act responsibly when necessary.

Freeman to make 1st start against Oklahoma State

By Jonathan Garten
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

True freshman Josh Freeman will make the first start of his collegiate career against Oklahoma State this Saturday at 2:35 p.m. at Snyder Family Stadium.

Freeman took over for senior Dylan Meier in the second half of K-State's 17-3 loss to Baylor last Saturday.

Freeman completed 11-of-33 passes for 196 yards and three interceptions.

"We want to make sure that we have good support around him," coach Ron Prince said. "I don't expect a quarterback to go in and win the game. Just play well, if you can, and then in the fourth quarter be prepared to be a hero."

Freeman will become the first true freshman to start a Big 12 Conference game this year.

He is the first true freshman to start at quarterback for K-State since Darrell Dickey in 1979.

Freshman Josh Freeman will get his first start of his colleigate career at quarterback on Saturday against Oklahoma State.

K-STATE SHUFFLES ROSTER

Along with Freeman, two other players will make their first starts for K-State, both on the offensive side of the ball.

True freshman Leon Patton will start at running back for the Wildcats, replacing senior Thomas Clayton. In four games played, Patton has rushed for 57 yards on 13 carries.

"I don't know how many players have run a 10.18 100-meter (dash)," Prince said. "Leon has that kind of speed."

The other new face in the offense will be redshirt freshman Brock Unruh starting at right guard. Unruh has played in two games this season.

"Brock had some really good practices last week," Prince said. "And I saw him go toe-to-toe with one of our best players at practices, and I was very impressed with how he was willing to fight and be tenacious."

The K-State offense ranks 82nd in the nation in scoring with an average of 20.2 points per game.

The Wildcats rank 88th in the country in total offense, averaging 299.2 yards per game.

Out of the 28 players requested for Tuesday's press conference, only three showed up.

Defensive end Ian Campbell, defensive end Rob Jackson and tight end Michael Pooschke were the only players who appeared for interviews.

GLF | Women's golf places 7th at KU tournament

The women's golf team traveled east to Kansas' home tournament and came away with a seventh-place finish.

K-State finished with a 78-over-par 942. The winner of the tournament was KU with a 53-over-par 917.

Individually for the Wildcats, juniors Michelle Regan and Hailey Mireles tied for 14th place with an 18-over-par 234. Junior Kali Quick and senior Katy Heffel tied for 29th with a 22-over-par 238, and sophomore Krista Nelson tied for 54th with a 34-over-par 250.

Two of the team members competed as individuals, and their scores did not factor into K-State's final score. Senior Helene Robert tied for 19th place with a 19-over-par 235, and freshman Abbi Nelson tied for 52nd with a 33-over-par 249.

Coach Kristi Knight said the final scores aren't an accurate look at the team's playing.

"Our scores didn't reflect the amount of quality golf played," Knight said. "It was a matter of not getting it into the house. We didn't finish. It's frustrating when you play and you let some shots get away. It gets your score up and leaves a bad taste in your mouth."

GLF | Men's golf improves in final day of Wolf Pack Classic

Following a second-round score of 299 to tie for 11th heading into the final day, the K-State men's golf team improved seven strokes and moved up two spots on the leader board during the final round of the Wolf Pack Classic.

The Wildcats carded a third-round score of 292 on the par 72, 7,100-yard Wolf Run Golf Course, finishing the event with a team score of 12-over par 876 (285-299-292), tying with Texas-El Paso for ninth place. Iowa State won the event after firing a 22-under par 842.

For the first time this season, sophomore Robert Streb led the Wildcats in an event. He tied for 20th overall at even-par 216 (71-72-73). It was his best finish since tying for 12th at the 2006 NCAA Central Regional, and his best finish versus par since the Barona Collegiate Cup last October.

Three strokes behind Streb was freshman Mitchell Gregson. The Waterloo, Ill., native, carded three counting rounds of 73-74-72 en route to a tie for 36th at 3-over par 219.

Another freshman, Joe Ida, recorded a second-straight solid performance, tying for 48th following at 5-over par 221.

If the streak is to end, the Wildcats will have to earn it against No. 1-ranked Nebraska, who enters today's game with a perfect 13-0 record.

The Wildcats showed promise in a loss to No. 8 Texas on Saturday, taking the Longhorns to five games and nearly pulling off the upset. Coach Suzie Fritz said her team showed a lot of positive signs in defeat.

"There were times where I felt we played very well," Fritz said. "Our serving was very good through about three and a half games ... and I liked what we were doing with our quick hitters."

Though Fritz emphasized that her team is focused on improving in each match — rather than stressing wins and losses — she would not discount the fact that it would be great to beat the nation's top-ranked team.

"If we should play to the level where we would have an opportunity to win against Nebraska, it would mean a lot," she said.

Federal funding allows institute to offer securities studies degree

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State is now one of the few universities in the nation to offer a graduate program in securities studies, courtesy of an addition by the Institute of Military History and 20th Century Studies.

Mark Parillo, director of the institute, said security studies deals with a number of issues related to national security, including internal threats, international studies and traditional home threats.

Parillo said a master's degree can be earned through the program, and student should be able to pursue a doctoral degree online in about a year. However, some applicants have been allowed to do coursework that will apply toward their doctorate.

"It is a very rare program, and there are only about half a dozen schools in the United States that offer the master's program. No others offer the Ph.D.," Parillo said.

The program was started for the soldiers at the Command and General Staff College in Fort Leavenworth due to specific federal funding that was received for the program, but the program is open to anyone, Parillo said.

He said the funding was provided to establish the program at K-State primarily because of the university's excellence in military history and political science.

"It's envisioned that, with the growing demand with expertise, this will be a program of choice for a growing number of people," Parillo said.

He said the program is not limited to U.S. national security. And though there are now no foreign students in the program, applications are pending.

"The program takes advantage of the number of strengths we have here, with everything we have at the library, our resources and our geographic location," he said.

Anthony Crawford, university archivist, said the library attempts to collect material on military history from donors in order to support the institute and other academic programs on campus.

He said the Department of History and Institute of Military History and 20th Century Studies have strong programs, and so the university attempts to find individual donors for historical items like letters, photos, maps and memorabilia. The items are then kept in the Archives Center where anyone in the country can use them.

David Graff, associate professor of history, said the institute, which includes the people in the history department who are working on military projects and subjects in 20th century studies, is not a teaching agency like a department.

"It's more intended to do things like promote research and facilitate fundraising and to sponsor programs that reach beyond the capabilities of a department," he said.

Department creates $20,000 fellowships

By Allison Voris
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State Foundation Changing Lives Campaign received $80,000 to establish the Brabender Bakery Science Fellowship.

The money was donated by C.W. Brabender Instruments Inc. The South Hackensack, N.J., company specializes in the manufacturing of equipment that measures and records various characteristics of foods and polymers.

K-State was selected for the award because of the programs it offers.

"We're the only grain science and industry department in the United States," said Virgil Smail, head of the Department of Grain Science and Industry. "We're renowned in the area of predicting and analyzing wheat quality performance."

Two graduate students in the department will receive the fellowship, worth $20,000 per year. Each recipient must be pursuing a master's or doctoral degree and will conduct a research project with the department.

"Their research is going to deal with the physical properties of dough, because that's what Brabender makes instruments for," said Jon Faubion, professor in grain science and industry.

The grain science and industry department has the support of others in the industry.

"Our industry supports us so well that we have so many scholarships and not enough students," Jabin Olds, senior in baking sciences, said. "Each student ends up getting a really good deal."

Smail said the department plans to search soon for candidates to receive the fellowship.

Gunman planned execution-style attack on Amish school for a week

By Mark Scolforo
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

QUARRYVILLE, Pa. – A gunman who invaded a tiny Amish school might have had a plan that went beyond the execution-style slayings of five girls.

Investigators believe Charles Carl Roberts IV, 32, spent nearly a week plotting his takeover of the one-room schoolhouse and might have been planning to sexually assault almost a dozen female students.

Based on the items he brought – including flexible plastic ties, eyebolts and lubricating jelly – "it's very possible that he intended to victimize these children in many ways prior to executing them and killing himself," State Police Commissioner Jeffrey B. Miller said Tuesday. But Roberts "became disorganized" when police arrived and shot himself in the head.

He confided to his wife during the siege that he molested two relatives 20 years ago and was tormented by dreams of doing it again, authorities said.

Holding up a copy of the gunman's suicide note at a packed news conference, Miller suggested that Roberts was haunted by the 1997 death of his prematurely born daughter, Elise, 20 minutes after her delivery.

Elise's death "changed my life forever," the milk truck driver and father of three wrote to his wife. "I haven't been the same since it affected me in a way I never felt possible. I am filled with so much hate, hate toward myself hate towards God and unimaginable emptyness it seems like everytime we do something fun I think about how Elise wasn't here to share it with us and I go right back to anger."

The state police commissioner described the demons in Roberts' head a day after the shooting rampage shattered the sense of calm in Lancaster County's bucolic Pennsylvania Dutch Country, where the Amish live a peaceful, turn-the-other-cheek existence in an 18th-century world with no automobiles and no electrical appliances.

"He certainly was very troubled psychologically deep down and was dealing with things that nobody else knew he was dealing with," Miller said.

The death toll rose to six Tuesday – including the gunman – when two girls died from their wounds.

During the standoff, Roberts told his wife in a cell phone call from the schoolhouse that he molested two female relatives when they were 3 to 5 years old, Miller said. Roberts would have been about 11 or 12 years old at the time. In a suicide note left for his family, he said he "had dreams about doing what he did 20 years ago again," Miller said.

Police could not immediately confirm Roberts' claim that he molested two relatives. Family members knew nothing of molestation in his past, Miller said. Police located the two relatives and were hoping to interview them.

If Roberts felt painfully conflicted about a sexual desire for little girls, he might have blamed the children themselves and acted out his rage on them, one expert said. He might have considered them "responsible for his downfall," said criminal psychologist Eric Hickey at Alliant International University in Fresno, Calif.

Roberts had planned the attack for nearly a week, buying plastic ties from a hardware store on Sept. 26 and several other items less than an hour before entering the school, Miller said.

The crime bore some resemblance to an attack on a high school in Bailey, Colo., where a 53-year-old man took six girls hostage and sexually assaulted them before fatally shooting one girl and killing himself. That attack occurred last Wednesday, the day after Roberts began buying materials for his siege.

Using a checklist that was later found in his pickup truck, Roberts brought to the school three guns, a stun gun, two knives, a pile of wood for barricading the doors, and a bag with 600 rounds of ammunition, police said. He also had a change of clothing, indicating he had planned a long siege, police said.

He sent the boys and several adults away and bound the girls together in a line at the blackboard. Miller on Tuesday revealed that one of the girls was able to escape with the boys.

A two-by-four piece of lumber found in the school had 10 large eyebolts spaced about 10 inches apart, suggesting that Roberts might have planned to truss up the girls and sexually assault them, Miller said.

"It's important to note that we had 10 victims at that time that were in the school," he said.

The girls left in the room were shot at close range shortly after police arrived, Miller said.

"We're quite certain, based on what we know, that he had no intention of coming out of there alive," Miller said.

At the time Roberts' wife received the phone call, she was attending a meeting of a prayer group she led that prayed for the community's schoolchildren.

The victims were identified as Naomi Rose Ebersole, 7; Anna Mae Stoltzfus, 12; Marian Fisher, 13; Mary Liz Miller, 8; and her sister Lena Miller, 7. Stoltzfus' sister was among the wounded.

Three other girls were in critical condition and two were in serious condition. They ranged in age from 6 to 13.

Roberts, from the nearby town of Bart, was not Amish and did not appear to have anything against the Amish, Miller said. He said Roberts was bent on killing girls and apparently figured he could succeed at the serene schoolhouse.

hensive ban, we request that you vote against the two other fake ordinances," she said.

COMMISSIONERS

Commissioners also were divided on the issue. They voted 2-3 against the first ordinance and 3-2 in favor of the second ordinance.

"For me, this is an issue of worker health," Commissioner Jayme Morris-Hardeman said. "That's the issue foremost in my mind. You would not allow a buisness owner to operate knowingly exposing workers to asbestos or mustard gas.

"Those ordinances are worthless. They are not protecting worker health. We're not doing anything. We're taking away business owners' rights by passing two or three. I don't think that's what we intended to do here."

Commissioner Mark Hatesohl said he supported the second ordinance because it was a compromise.

"We're only taking some rights, not all," he said. He also said there should be freedom from governmental interference when possible.

Commissioner Tom Phillips, whose wife supports a smoking ban, also voted against the first ordinance.

"This has been extremely hard for me," he said. "We're simply displacing smokers to the outdoors. They'll be lining up on sidewalks and outdoor seating areas. People are still going to be subjected to second-hand smoke."

Mayor Bruce Snead said he received more public input on the smoking ordinance than on almost any other issue put before the commission. He said he received 230 e-mails in support of a ban and 22 against it.

"I wish the state would pass a ban," he said. "I think it's important on a state-wide basis. But we all live right here; that's where we can all make a difference."

He said he would vote for the first ordinance but not the second. Snead said the question of the economic effect of a ban has been answered, as there has been no profit loss in cities like Lawrence.

"Sometimes, doing something isn't better than doing nothing, especially when you have the opportunity," he said. "What two does is nowhere near what could be accomplished by one. Clearly for me, if we pass any other ordinance, we're falling short of what the facts and our public speak to clearly.

"In our form of representative government, you do the best you can. You do something that works well and provides an even playing field, and I think that's what this community expects in this regard."

City manager Ron Fehr said the second ordinance would take time to implement.

"It may be some time before we bring the second reading back to you," he said.

Media ownership hearings start

By Gary Gentile
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LOS ANGELES – The concentration of media ownership by a few large corporations came under attack Tuesday as the Federal Communications Commission opened a series of hearings on the issue.

"Without diversity in ownership and participation, our democracy is in danger," Rep. Maxine Waters said at the initial hearing held at the University of Southern California.

Waters, a Los Angeles Democrat, and others criticized ownership of the Los Angeles Times and KTLA-TV by Chicago-based Tribune Co.

Speakers said the situation stifled competition and diversity of local opinion.

The FCC is reconsidering a number of broadcast ownership rules, including whether a company should be able to own both a newspaper and television station in the same market.

The last time the agency revisited the ownership rules was in 2003, when it voted 3-2 to raise the national audience cap for television station owners, lessen restrictions on how many stations a company may own in the same market and allow for some cross-ownership of newspapers and broadcast stations.

"The Tribune Co. that owns the L.A. Times and these other stations operates out of Chicago and not L.A., and there is something about that that is inherently undemocratic," Jackson said.

The media ownership issue has not reached the same level of interest as it did in 2003, when the FCC was besieged with complaints from media consolidation foes on both the right and the left. This time around, the marquee issue – the national broadcast audience cap – is off the table.

After the FCC voted in 2003 to expand the number of American households a single television broadcast company could reach from 35 percent to 45 percent, Congress intervened, setting the limit at 39 percent.

Tuesday's hearing was dominated by entertainment industry workers including actors, directors and writers who joined in urging the FCC to allow independent producers greater access to vertically integrated media conglomerates that produce, own and distribute their own programs.

"Homogenization is good for milk, but bad for ideas," said Patric Verrone, president of the Writers Guild of America, west.

Ad campaign improves perceptions of Manhattan

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The results are in, and Manhattan is the destination of choice for a majority of respondents to a survey on the Manhattan 24/7 advertising campaign.

The campaign was designed to establish Manhattan as the center of life in the Flint Hills, according to a press release from the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce.

Targeting people living within a 60-mile radius, a survey was sent to 4,540 residents in the eight counties surrounding Riley County.

The survey was completed and returned by 772 respondents, the press release said.

Of the respondents, 214 people said they come to Manhattan for grocery shopping.

The number of people who choose Manhattan for non-grocery shopping for items like clothing and dining is 461, according to the press release.

The shopping experiences of 411 people have improved during the past year, compared to 286 who said it stayed the same, and 40 who responded that it declined.

The advertising campaign improved 121 individuals' perceptions of Manhattan, and the services available, according to the press release.

"That's just an outstanding response," said Beverly Orr, membership program manager for the chamber.

Geoff Ramsey, voice actor for the character Grif of the online video series "Red vs. Blue," edits the newly released video for the series Friday afternoon in Rooster Teeth Productions office in Buda, Texas. The video was the first episode of the fifth season and the 78th video of the series.

Popular online comedy series produced with voiceovers, 'Halo' video

By Jonathan Garten
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

BUDA, Texas – A group of futuristic soldiers wearing red armor stands on one side of a virtual canyon, discussing philosophy. Why are they there? What are they fighting for?

On the other side of the canyon, a team of blue soldiers stands around doing the same thing. They're locked in a battle no one ever wins.

The two teams are the stars of an online comedy series called "Red vs. Blue" at www.redvsblue.com. Burnie Burns, the show's creator, uses the video game "Halo" for animation and then records voices over the scenes.

"I've played video games my whole life, and now I actually feel like I'm part of the video-game industry," Burns said.

Burns and his friends have been making the series "Red vs. Blue" for more than three years. The show, which is produced in an apartment in Buda, has five seasons and 78 episodes so far.

He said "Red vs. Blue" humor has evolved so people who do not play video games can understand the jokes. The show has featured a Spanish-speaking robot none of the characters can understand and a tank no one knows how to drive.

Courtesy photo
Still from Halo 2 video game

Burns compared the animation of his show to the movie "Toy Story." Except he needs 12 other people, three Xbox video game consoles and 40-50 hours to make one five-minute weekly episode.

Burns said "Red vs. Blue" creators devote one Xbox to a character who serves as the show's cameraman. The audience views all the scenes taking place from the cameraman's point of view.

Using Xbox controllers, Burns and his friends make their characters walk and move their heads to give the impression they are talking.

Everything is recorded and edited by a computer. Voices, audio and visual effects are then added.

"It's technically 3D animation," Burns said, "but it's done in real time on the fly."

Burns' film experience dates back to when he was a student at the University of Texas. He and friends Matt Hullum and Joel Heyman created a film called "The Schedule" in 1996.

After presenting their movie at several film festivals, Heyman and Hullum decided to pursue careers in Hollywood. Burns, a computer science student, got a technology support job in Austin, Texas.

He brainstormed "Red vs. Blue" while writing video game reviews in 2002 for a Web site called www.drunkgamers.com. In trying to write a funny review for "Halo," Burns tried turning it into a video with voiceovers.

With help from Hullum, Heyman, and Burns' www.drunkgamers.com coworkers Gustavo Sorola and Geoff Fink, "Red vs. Blue" began on April 1, 2003.

From top left, Matt Hullum, voice actor for "Red vs. Blue" character Sarge; Jason Saldaña, voice actor for Tucker; Gus Sorola, voice actor for Simmons; Burnie Burns, voice actor for Church and director; Luke McKay, artist; and Geoff Ramsey, voice actor for Grif, are members of Rooster Teeth Productions who work to produce the company's videos. The online series "Red vs. Blue," which is produced by the group, uses video games for animation and voiceovers for sound.

In less than two weeks, "Red vs. Blue" had about 250,000 online visits. Burns said the former Web site, www.drunkgamers.com, had about 3,000 visitors a day while it was online.

"It exceeded our wildest expectations in about 10 minutes," Burns said.

But the fans weren't the only ones who noticed. Less than a month after the first episode was released, Bungie Studios, the creator of "Halo," called Burns about the show.

The result of the phone call was a contract with Microsoft Corp., owner of Bungie Studios. Burns said he is not allowed to discuss the details of the contract but said he, Hullum, Sorola, Fink and Jason Saldana do not have jobs in addition to their positions with "Red vs. Blue."

Music reviews by Mark Sibilla

David Thomas Broughton, "The Complete Guide to Insufficiency"

This album was recorded in a single take in a church in Leeds with only Broughton, his guitar, some looping pedals and a cheap drum machine. These five songs create a beautifully epic song suite with ruminations on death, war, love and longing. The incredibly intimate atmosphere makes this a truly harrowing, yet absolutely essential, listen.
Grade: A

NOMO, "New Tones"

This Detroit-based collective creates an electronic, jazzy, funk-influenced and Afrobeat-inspired sound with odd instrumentation and an amazing horn section. But no matter how many modifiers are added, the band's sound simply can be referred to as "damn good music."
Grade: A-

Belle and Sebastian, "The Life Pursuit"

This is the seventh studio LP for veteran Scottish indie-pop band Belle and Sebastian. It is also one of its best. The band expands its sound and influences to glam-rock pioneers like T. Rex ("White Collar Boy") and classic Motown soul ("Song for Sunshine").

Through all of the band's expansion, Belle and Sebastian still manage to retain those sunny melodies and sly wit.

Hair Do's

Classic bobs, blunt bangs, deep colors among most popular winter trends

By Eileen Laux
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sleek, textured, sharp, blunt and teased – these are just a few words that describe the latest hair trends, according to Marie Claire magazine. New trends are surfacing from the hottest designers' runway shows like Michael Kors, Chanel and Roberto Cavalli.

"On the runway, hair is usually a part of a theme," said Emily Prothe, senior in apparel and textiles. "I think that today just about any hairstyle is in if you make it your own."

Prothe, whose mother is a stylist, said her hair is naturally straight, but she sometimes curls it for a more fun look. She said she doesn't usually use products because products weigh down her thick hair.

Prothe said whether it is a hairstyle or the whole look, "just make it your own and be comfortable with your own style."

Belinda Snyder, owner of Shear Dynamics Salon & Day Spa, said this season there is a lot of texture in hair. In terms of color, the "spicy" colors are in this season, including mochas, dark reds, caramels and coffee colors like espressos or lattes (a light blond color with a rich brown undertone).

"You can bring texture in with color as well," Snyder said. "This season is really about movement, even if you are straightening your hair."

Snyder said she recently read an article that said bobs are returning, but she said longer styles still seem to be popular.

She and her team recently went to a hair show in Nebraska, and they saw blunt bangs, which is a "real retro look." In terms of updos, she said they are seeing more sleek style with an elegant 1960s and 1970s look.

She said many looks have more design in them, with color, cut and style.

"Volume is a big look this season," she said. "We are not seeing the old type of perm anymore, it is more about the big loose curls."

TOP 10 HAIRSTYLES FOR FALL FASHION SEASON

1. Slicked back
To get this sleek style, smooth dry hair back with a dab of styling cream then douse with hairspray for hold.

2. Significant volume
Big hair is always sexy. Get it by applying a volumizing mousse to your roots then blow-drying with a round brush for extra body.

3. Sharp part
A deep side part is an easy way to create a polished look without a lot of fuss.

4. Blunt bangs
The best way to wear bangs this season: just below the eyebrow and cut straight across.

5. Super straight
After a summer of wavy styles, the sleek look is in again. To get it, use a paddle brush to pull hair straight as you blow-dry. Finish with a flatiron.

6. Sculpted waves
Try this rippled style for evening. Comb a styling cream through damp hair, set in finger waves, and then let air-dry.

7. Wild texture
Play up natural body by scrunching a wave-enhancing gel into roots then blow-drying upside down.

8. Big updo
For a playful look, tease your hair at the roots, mist with hairspray, and then pull back into a high ponytail.

9. Trendy twist
A neat French twist is always chic. The way to wear it this season: loose on top and slicked back on the sides with a small dab of pomade.

10. Teased on top
For a pouf with punch, backcomb your hair at the crown, then pull back the sides and secure.

Super-thin Madrid fashion week models banned from runway

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

How thin is too thin? This was the question at fashion week in Madrid, Spain, last month.

The Madrid fashion week organizers banned models who were considered too thin according to height-to-weight ratios provided by the World Health Organization, said Jackie White, fashion editor of the Kansas City Star.

In effect, models who weigh less than 125 pounds are prohibited from working the runway. Organizers of the event wanted to project an "image of beauty and health," White said.

The fashion business is composed of designers who want the perfect frame for their clothes, but sometimes these models portray unrealistic images to young people.

White said it is a positive step by designers trying to discourage anorexia, because some of the young female models are too thin, White said.

However, she does not see the super-thin model image disappearing.

"I don't see it changing in this country. The Latino aesthetic may be able to accept a body that is not anorexic thin, but I don't see it changing in New York," White said.

White said she was in New York for fashion week when she saw models in a Brazilian swimsuit show. She said she could see their bones because of their low weight. She said when she thinks of swimsuit models, she thinks of a little curve.

Body image and size depend on what the designers want.

"They want models that can wear anything from a whole collection on the runway," White said.

The modeling industry makes some feel they have to be thin, because clothes look better on a thin body, White said.

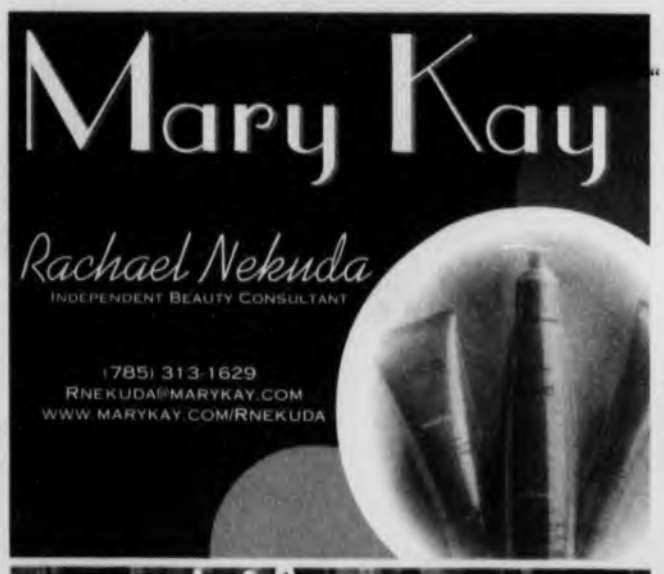
It is more desirable to be a runway model because the runway pays more than magazines, said Clark Cordova, booker for I & I Wilhemina modeling agency.

"The model image is based on a look, just because a girl is 5-foot-11 does not mean she is fashion girl; it's all about her look," Cordova said.

But the requirements are changing. Madrid set an example by not letting models weigh less than a certain amount; organizers sent quite a few women home, Cordova said.

The models have to be 5-foot-9 to 5-foot-11 to go on the runway, Cordova said.

"I never go by weight. I usually go by measurement – 34, 24, 34 is what they like them to be," Cordova said.



The runway represents a small segment of the entire fashion business.

These too-thin models are banned from the runway and cannot do magazine work, Cordova said.

New York models live a different life than Midwestern models, because they are always on the run, they smoke all the time to stay thin, and they have to balance work during the day with maintaining the night-life image of a model, White said.

Keep eyeliner simple

Eyeliner is essential to get your eyes noticed
You should use liner only on your top lids this season, keeping your look simple yet sophisticated.

Make 'em blush

For your cheeks, highlight them with terra cotta-colored blushes. Beauty experts recommend keeping a natural look for the face. When applying blush, try a sample brush on the back of your hand. Keep the blush light and have fun exploring different colors this season. For more makeup tips, go to www.allure.com.

Shade your lips with deep reds

In the latest issue of Allure magazine, editors say deep cranberries and dark reds are colors you should opt for this season. They also suggest sticking to a matte finish for your lips as opposed to a shiny gloss.

A black coat

To capture the best look for your eyes this season, wear black mascara. During the day, stick to a simple brown or brownish-black mascara. You also should keep mascara light by applying only one coat. For a night out, feel free to coat your lashes twice. When you add an extra coat at your lashes' corners, your eyes will appear wider.

Shadows

Keep your look simple.
Stick to browns and other skin-colored tones. Greens and browns are bound to make you look great.

Blazers, sweaters anchor men's winter wardrobes; watches, sunglasses easily accessorize any outfit

Photos by Joslyn Brown | COLLEGIAN

To look your best this winter, consider investing in a few fashion staples. Sweaters and blazers keep you warm and dress up about anything in your wardrobe.

KRIS FITZGERALD

The seasons are changing, and we are getting closer to being showered with Halloween candy and Christmas gifts. And with the colder weather comes a change in clothing.

Comfortable clothing and style should be the combination for this fall and winter. Although I'm not an expert, some small fashion tips can prevent you from looking like a jack-o-lantern this season.

A key element in any winter closet is the blazer. It adds versatility to what you wear. With T-shirts, sweaters and practically anything you want to put on underneath, you can toss on your blazer, and it fits perfectly. A lot of people are turning to the blazer look because it's a little less formal than suits, but still makes you look sleek and stylish. Dark and subtle colors are the way to appear fashionable and warm this fall.

Sweaters of all kinds are a good thing to own. Vogue magazine features a lot of vests, sweaters, turtlenecks, sleeveless sweater vests and somewhat oversized sweaters inspired by the British. Some rather pricey but highly esteemed fabrics for sweaters are cashmere and fine wool.

Common accessories to own are watches and sunglasses. Fossil has plenty of nice-looking watches for decent prices. But you also can find good deals at stores around town, and they look just as nice without the name brand. Sunglasses are always a fun thing to have. Whether you're looking to rock stunner shades or just have that cool, sleek, confident look with a pair of Oakley sunglasses, have a set on hand. Just because it's winter doesn't mean the sun doesn't shine.

Midwestern models have more normal lives, are not as stressed and are not as pressured to be so thin, White said.

White said celebrities reinforce the super-thin model image.

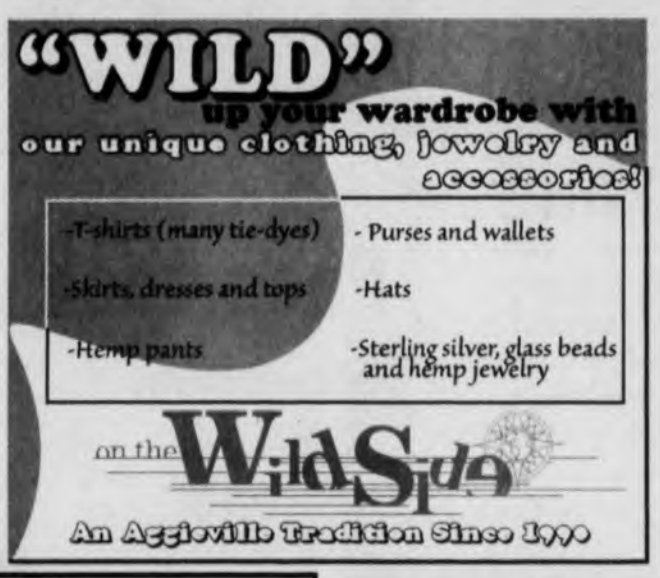
Kate Moss started the incredibly thin model trend. Celebrity Nicole Ritchie reinforces the mindset that to look good, you have to be really thin, White said.

"I think it's been accelerated by celebrities. Back in the 1980s super-thin models reached an extreme with the extremely unhealthy thin Kate Moss doing Calvin Klien ads," White said.

Eating disorders have been around for a long time, said Supavan Brown, doctoral intern at University Counseling Services.

Not all models are stick-thin, but the models portrayed as having the ideal body type look frail, thin, emaciated and malnourished, Brown said.

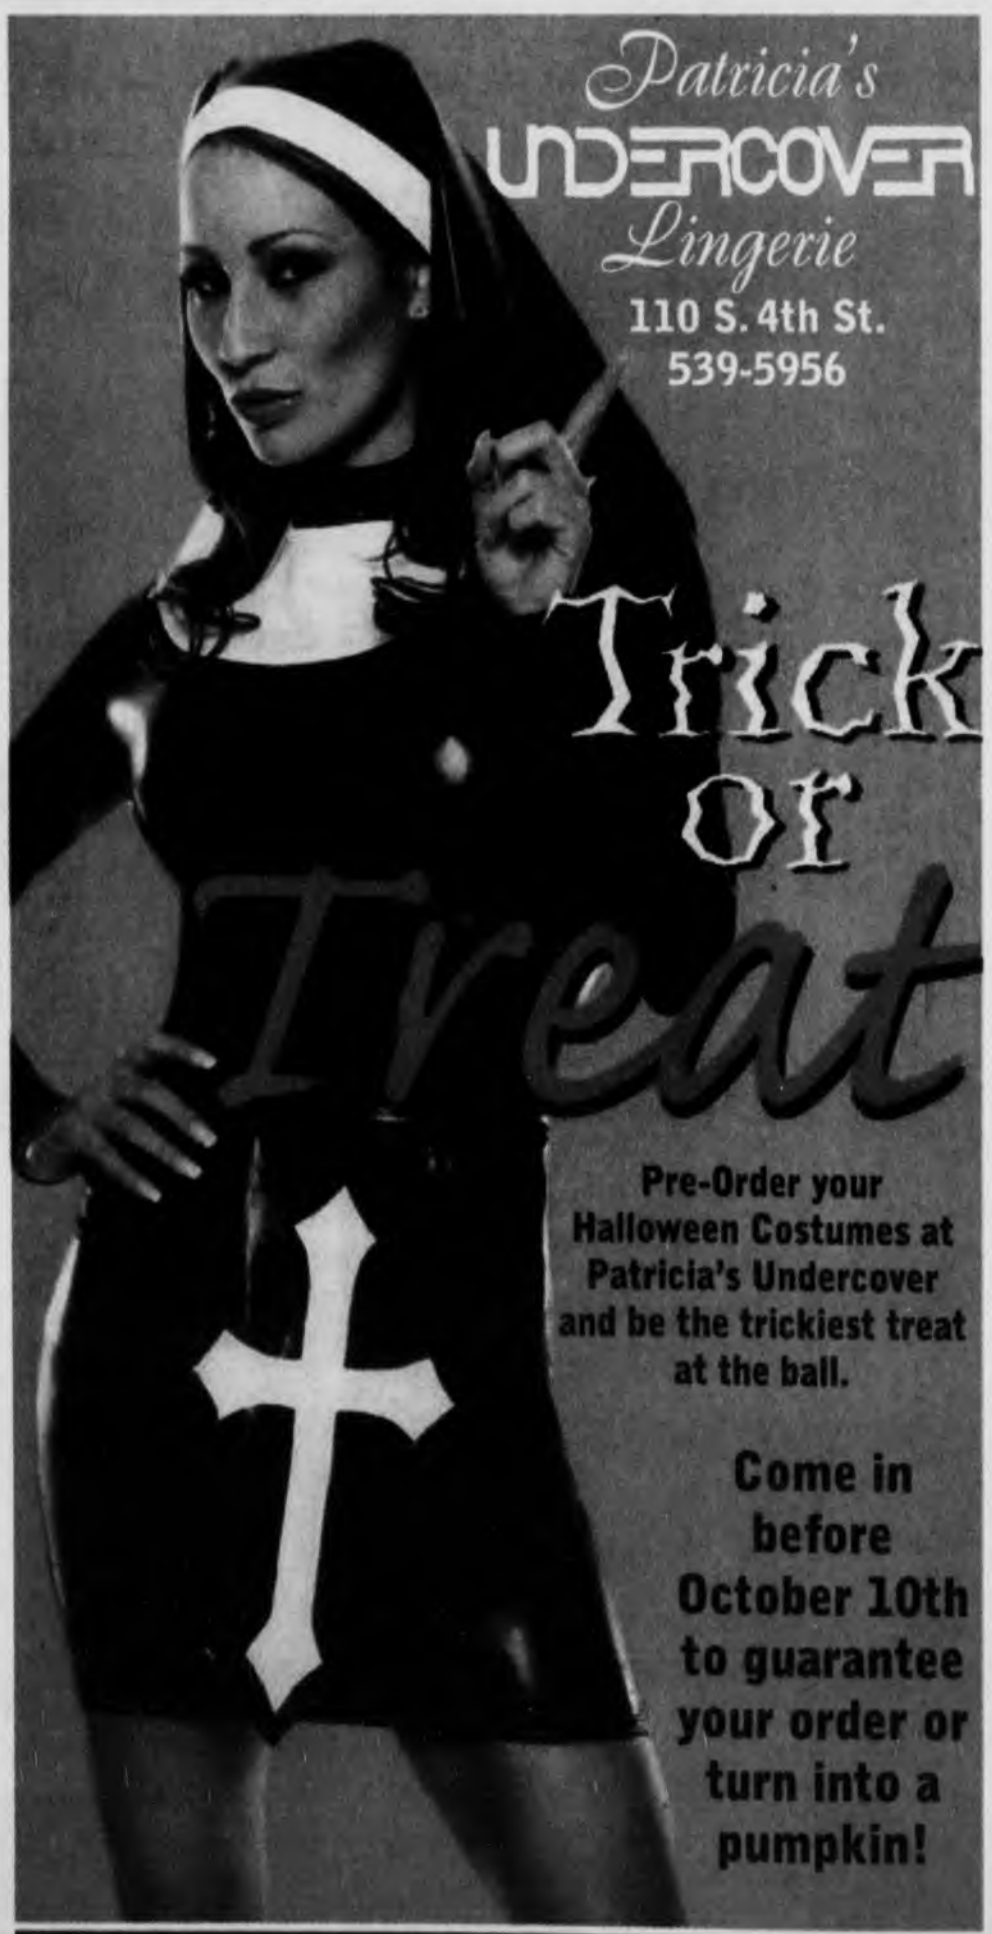
"This is a popular trend and is a standard that has been set by the fashion world that is not obtainable for most women," Brown said.



Women sometimes binge and purge to gain control in one area of their lives – weight, Brown said.

White said most women are not swayed by stick-thin model images, because good parents enforce healthy behaviors and body images. Mothers can set standards of which body images are acceptable.

Madrid fashion week organizers used the media in a positive way to show ultra-thiness is not a healthy or attractive fad, Brown said.



"The standard size for most models is unhealthy and unreasonable," Brown said. "This event was a start to outweigh images that are already out there."

Lafene, local clinics administer flu shots

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Flu season is officially here, and local clinics are distributing flu shots.

Lafene Health Center is distributing the influenza vaccine to high-risk students and faculty. The cost is $14, and the vaccine can be received in the form of a shot or through the nasal passage.

According to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention Web site, those who at high risk for being infected with the flu include people with certain chronic health conditions, children ages 6 months to 59 months, pregnant women, people who are in contact with children younger than 6 months old, health care workers, and people who are in household contact with those who are at high risk for the flu.

The Kansas Department of Health recommends that whenever possible, anyone older than 6 months should get a flu shot, said Mike Heideman, communications specialist for the department.

The Riley County Health Department also will distribute flu shots to anyone who wants a vaccination. The cost is $24 per shot. For those covered by Medicaid and Medicare, the expenses for the shot will be paid.

"We have no stipulations this year. Whoever wants to get one will get one," said Kathy Dickey-Wilson, clinic supervisor of the Riley County Health Department.

Heideman said he has not heard any news of a possible influenza out-

2 lecturers to address AIDS awareness, fight

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Acting on AIDS lectures
Who: Dr. Scott Todd
When: 3:30-5 p.m. today and 8-9:15 a.m. Friday
Where: Multicultural Student Office, first floor of the K-State Student Union

Who: Solange Uwituze
When: 8-10 tonight
Grace Baptist Church, 2901 Dickens Ave.

Acting on AIDS will facilitate two lectures today to tell students how to become active in the fight against AIDS. The event is supported by several K-State campus ministries.

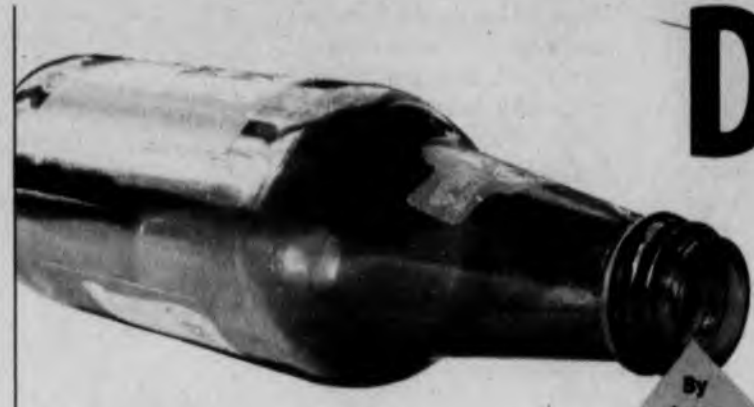
According to the Acting on AIDS Web site, www.worldvision.org/aoa.nsf/aids/home, the organization was started by Christian university students to create awareness and promote activism at colleges and universities across the nation in response to the global AIDS pandemic.

Wade Weber, director of InterVarsity Christian Fellowship, said the speakers of the lectures have ties to K-State.

"We wanted to show the K-State faces who are actually on the front lines working towards solutions for the AIDS pandemic," he said.

According to the event schedule, Solange Uwituze, graduate student in animal science and industry, will give a speech titled "Orphans and AIDS: What Would Jesus Do?" She will talk about her native country, Rwanda, and her experience living in the country during the 1994 genocide. Uwituze started an orphanage in the community.

Dr. Scott Todd, international health specialist for Compassion International, will speak today and Friday about career and academic exploration in AIDS fields. Todd has worked at the Terry C. Johnson Center for Basic Cancer Research.



Weber said after the lecture, attendees will be invited to participate in three activities: a community partnership in Butare, Rwanda; a child sponsorship with Compassion International; and Acting on AIDS's work on campus.

"Students should expect to be challenged and amazed at the scope and the effect that AIDS is having globally," Weber said.

Josh Hersh, junior in speech communication, is responsible for starting Acting on AIDS at K-State. He said he attended a conference on the organization and learned it didn't exist at universities, so brought it to campus.

Hersh said the organization not only raises awareness, but also gives college students a chance to do something about the issue.

"It's coming from the idea of relational advocacy rather than shipping money somewhere and hoping it gets there," Hersh said.

Drying up

10 fraternities ban alcohol on property

By Jonas Hogg
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Fraternities around the nation are drying up, and K-State is no exception.

At present, 10 K-State fraternities have adopted policies that prohibit alcohol on fraternity grounds. The growing trend of "dry" houses is a mixture of university policies, fraternity headquarters' decisions and local chapters' dialogue.

According to a Jan. 9, 2005, New York Times article, "Ban of Brothers," at least 30 colleges nationwide have banned alcohol in fraternity houses.

These national changes are being brought about by a continuum of issues. Alcohol-related deaths and injuries have plagued fraternities in recent years – a disaster K-State's fraternities have avoided. Other factors include rising insurance costs, social responsibility and an increasing outreach to the non-drinking college crowd.

Locally, the decisions are being left to the fraternities, and K-State seems to be applying a hands-off approach. Each of K-State's 10 dry houses undertook the policy for varying reasons, including disciplinary actions, a national fraternity headquarters mandate and a clause in a remodeling contract that mandates the house be alcohol-free.

"We provide support, consultation. We don't mandate any of that, and there are no IFC or Greek Affairs policies requiring fraternities to be a certain way," Scott Jones, director of Greek Affairs, said.

The InterFraternity Council's only role concerning alcohol is during disciplinary measures, which can place restrictions or prohibitions on alcohol-related activities.

"If those were to be set up with a chapter, then that would be to help them get back on track to be able to make better choices and to build a capacity to be more responsive and more responsible in the way that they deal with events that may have alcohol at them," Jones said.

Barring disciplinary cases requiring immediate action, when fraternities do go dry, locally or nationally, they often are given a list of changes to make on a timetable, which gives fraternities a chance to test the dry waters before taking the plunge.

"They would work toward that date and have a transition process, and they work to that," said Brandon Cutler, assistant director of Greek Affairs.

For some houses though, dry policies are decades-old news.

Jim Griffith, executive director for FarmHouse Fraternity's national headquarters, said FarmHouse was the first to go dry.

"We've had a policy in place ... since 1974 that we have alcohol-free chapter houses," he said.

Many fraternities were dry during the early part of the 20th century, but relaxed their policies during part of the 1950s, 1960s and 1970s, Griffith said.

"For us as an organization, we've found it's been a great step for us over the years to have this," he said. "It makes a huge difference in our organizations and the high expectation we have for our chapters."

The most recent addition to K-State's voluntary dry roster is Pi Kappa Phi fraternity, which became dry on May 14, according to a Collegian article. Tyler Price, president of the fraternity, said the decision was made locally by current students and alumni.

"We had seen ... the advantages that houses not only at K-State, but houses nationally, had from going dry," Price, senior in social sciences, said.

Board of Regents increases pay for state university heads

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

This year President Jon Wefald received a salary increase that ups his total earnings to $296,400, including supplements.

On Sept. 21, the Kansas Board of Regents gave the leaders of all six Kansas universities pay raises for Fiscal Year 2007. The chief administrators at K-State, the University of Kansas and Wichita State University all received up to 4-percent salary raises.

Wefald's pay has increased significantly over his two decades at K-State, and the components of his compensation have changed, said Bruce Shubert, associate vice president of administration and finance.

Shubert said the alterations were made because of the success and accomplishments the university has seen through Wefald's leadership.

In recent years, presidential compensation packages have become more complex. They include a variety of benefits, bonuses and prerequisites, many of which are paid in full or in part by private foundations.

JON WEFALD
K-STATE PRESIDENT

Wefald is provided a three-story home by the university and automobiles for business purposes through the KSU Foundation, Shubert said.

When he was hired in 1987, Wefald earned $92,000, $204,440 less than his current earnings. He hit the $200,000 mark in 2002.

In 2004, someone endowed the salaries of chief administrators at K-State, KU and Wichita State, said Cindy Bontrager, director of K-State's Budget Office.

After this donation, the Board set a maximum salary for state funding and state appropriation in 2004, Bontrager said.

Since 2004, Wefald has received compensation every year, including FY 2006, when he received $54,655.

This year, $56,841 of Wefald's total salary is endowments.

In comparison, KU Chancellor Robert Hemenway will earn $319,280 for FY 2007, $22,880 more than Wefald's earnings.

"Kansas as a state is not by any means on top of the pay scale for university officials," said Lynn Bretz, KU director of university communications.

University of Michigan President Mary Sue Coleman earns a total annual university compensation of $724,604, nearly $200,000 more than Wefald, according to the Chronicles of Higher Education.

Kip Peterson, director for Government Relations and Communications for the Regents, said North Carolina State University officials earn at least 12 percent more than K-State officials.

"I think K-State is getting a bargain (in Wefald)," Shubert said. "Only a handful of presidents have been at an institution as long as he has and has had the amount of success."

Gay men banned from giving blood

By Jonas Hogg
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Red Cross urges all possible donors to roll up their sleeves and share a pint. So why is Greg Marquardt barred from donating?

It's not a recent piercing, a tattoo or even travel to disease-ridden areas that bar him from donation. Marquardt, junior in social sciences, is gay, and since 1985, the United States Food and Drug Administration and the American Red Cross have barred any man who has had "sexual contact with another man, even once since 1977," from donating blood.

Stemming from the early 1980s scare, when AIDS was often referred to as GRID – Gay Related Immune Deficiency – the blanket ban has remained controversial as groups, in increasing numbers, are challenging its necessity.

The first time Marquardt went to give blood, he was asked about his sexual history. After his answer, he was turned away.

"I wasn't going to lie to them," he said.

Marquardt said the prohibitions are discriminatory, and with advancements in testing procedures for blood-borne diseases, everyone should be allowed to donate. Although given this history of HIV and AIDS, Marquardt said he could, partially, understand the initial reasons for the ban.

However, in the 21 years since the ban, Marquardt thinks changes should have been made.

"HIV isn't just caused by homosexuality," he said.

FDA prohibitions are contested by some groups, but all blood donor organizations in the United States abide by them.

"This is a recommendation, but it's considered to be industry standard," said Paul Richards, public affairs specialist for the FDA.

The FDA maintains responsibility for regulating the nation's blood supply, Richards said, and is dedicated to ensuring that supply is composed of the safest blood possible.

Even as testing for blood-borne diseases increases in efficacy, the FDA remains adamant that screening is an essential part of risk-management, Richards said.

The results of the prohibition and its controversy are not unknown to the FDA, which most recently examined the policy on March 8, but did not change the policy.

"We understand fully that our recommendations ... ultimately have the effect of deferring all gay men, and the FDA is not trying to imply by our recommendation that those individuals practice unsafe or risky behaviors or are HIV positive," he said.

"Safety depends not only on donor testing but behavioral statistics."

Statistically, gay men remain at the forefront of new HIV transmissions, with Centers for Disease Control and Prevention estimates for 2004 blaming male-to-male sexual contact for 17,691 new cases, more than three times the 5,149 cases due to heterosexual contact.

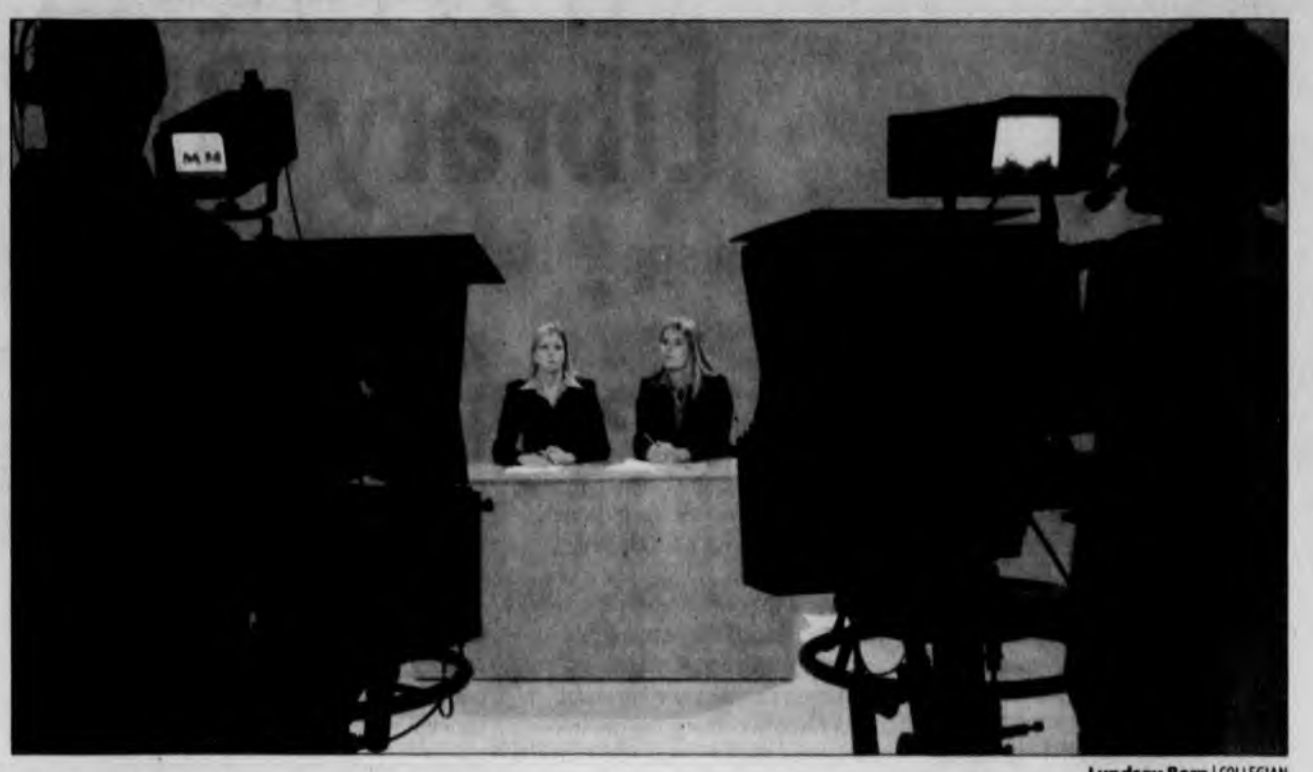
The pioneers of K-State's ongoing blood drive, the Red Cross, are bound to the decisions of the FDA and do not lobby either way.

"We would remain neutral, and that's pretty much what we do," said Norma Dickson, director of communications for the Kansas Red Cross. "We offer no opinion or judgment on lifestyle choices."

Although local groups are not exerting pressure, on March 10 – two days after the FDA's reevaluation – the American Red Cross joined with the American Association of Blood Banks and America's Blood Centers in petitioning the FDA to relax the guidelines.

There is wiggle-room in the FDA's recommendations, though, with different rules for different activities.

ZLB Plasma Services has different standards for plasma donors than the Red Cross, assistant manager Jennifer Wilson said.



"We have some of the same; some of them are different," she said.

Wilson declined to specify what the differences were, saying disclosure of that information could compromise screening procedures.

But Marquardt and other groups don't want some exceptions to some rules – they want to give blood.

"I think it's ridiculous," he said. "If straight people are allowed to give blood, I don't see why we can't."

Library villians

Instead of providing quiet space, Hale becomes a haven for distrac ting coughers, walkers

GRANT REICHERT

My heart is a wilting, burning, Hindenburg of hate, disintegrating as it plummets toward my bowels. Spite – seething spite – consumes me as my eyes blink asynchronously out of rage.

That vein in your forehead, the one that throbs when you're angry, has entirely detached from my face and hitchhiked to the border to participate in cage matches with desperate, knife-wielding illegals.

Why all the anger? Simple: I'm at Hale Library, humanity's collective repository of enraging distractions.

Like you, I come from the last generation not to receive the magic, zombificatory powers of Ritalin, and thus, my mind has all the focus of a Tarantino flick. The slightest ambient noise sends my synapses scattering like a pack of frightened meerkats. I even get distracted by the sound the paint makes as it adheres to the walls – you know, that constant "hssshh-haaahhh."

But now the paint is the least of the distractions. I had found an empty, secluded room in Hale in which to study, but I had barely started when two people sat directly behind me, close enough that our magnetic fields mingled uncomfortably.

And then began the smoker's hack.

It was that hack that's always on the verge of success, the one that says, "C'mon, just one more hack, and then we'll finally be able to disgorge that last bit of carbonized lung. Hack-gurgle-gurgle. Almost. Just one more..."

My studies were forgotten as I sat riveted in a mixture of rage and anticipation. This time? "Hack-gurgle-gurgle..." Almost!

Then, just when I thought I could take no more, her hack finally catches, and a tar-smeared, phlegm-dripping chimney sweep scampers past my legs. She lunges at him, but the little urchin easily wrenches his oil-slick body away and is free.

Unable to concentrate and trembling with rage, I move to the tables on the east side and set up camp.

I haven't even opened my book when I hear it coming, the fwish-fwish of thigh-on-thigh friction. Oh, God save me, it's a library walker!

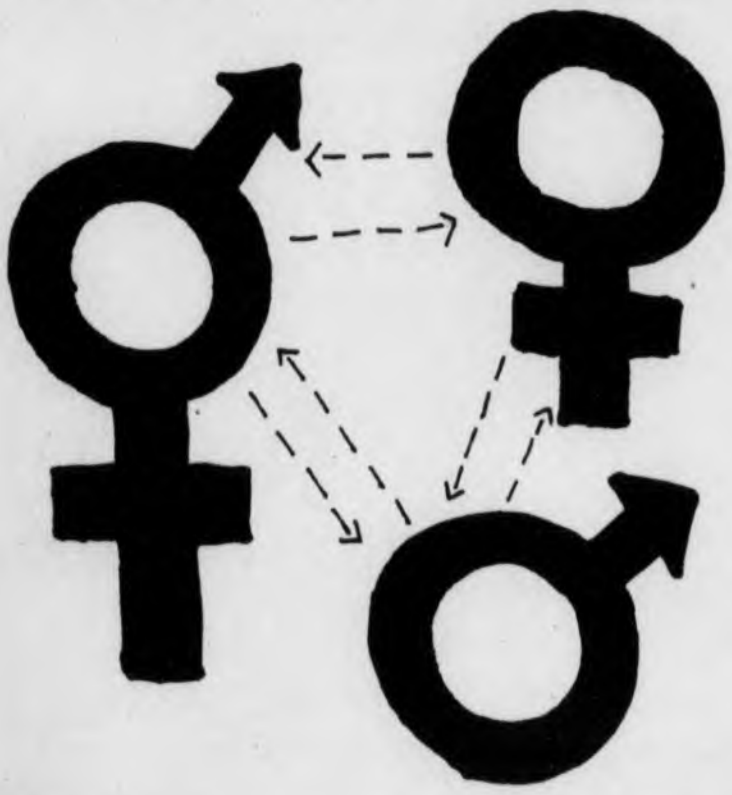
Legend tells of these lost souls, constantly walking laps around the fourth floor in order to exercise because, apparently, they lack the region of their brain necessary to properly interpret incoming sense data.

Seriously, what is their thought process like? "I need some exercise – off to the library! I'm starving – maybe there's something good on TV! My teeth are dirty – I think I'll start punching in car windows until the police arrive!"

The impending fwish makes concentration impossible. I time the length of her laps, cold sweat dripping down my face, fingernails digging into my palms, awaiting that crescendoing fwish in agony. Studying is impossible – my usually upbeat smiley emotion inverts to a left parenthesis of pure rage.

And then, the final indignity. Tonight, it turns out, is "Study Table." This is when fraternity guys are forced into the library in the vain hope that they will cease to be fraternity guys – you can lead a fraternity guy to books, but you can't make him think.

What is Study Table like? Imagine a pack of starving bonobos squabbling loudly over the last filthy cantaloupe rind. Now, replace the bonobos with fraternity guys, and the filthy cantaloupe rind with the affections of a female covered in so much face paint she looks like a Van Gogh. A touch of mascara or "The Starry Night"?



Either way, studying at Hale is impossible – the fraternity guys, the walkers, the hackers, the paint. Someone needs to put their foot down. Quietly.

Transgender, intergender people deserve social, legal equality

LOLA SHRIMPLIN

Most people realize their gender identity when they are 2 or 3 years old and their sexual orientation when they are adolescents, a friend told me.

Yet most people seem to get the two confused.

Everybody has a sexual orientation, and everyone has a gender identity, but they are not necessarily the same.

Sexual orientation is to whom you are attracted.

Gender identity is as whom you identify. Some people don't identify with the body into which they were born.

This is especially difficult, because the transgender community isn't accepted in the heterosexual community and sometimes not in the homosexual community, either.

I am a woman. I identify as a woman. But I know men who identify as women. That's who they are. To say they are any less is wrong.

Not all transgender people are the same.

Some feel uncomfortable in their bodies, and some don't.

Some are attracted to men, some to women.

Some are homosexual; some aren't, just like people all over the world.

Under the transgender umbrella comes a whole different group of people who identify as intergender, identifying with neither the male gender nor the female.

Simply limiting the human race to two choices, either male or female, perpetuates a myth, said Alley Stoughton, associate professor of computing information and science.

Stoughton identifies as intergender and said there are terms for referring to people of that persuasion that don't classify them as male or female.

"In an ideal world, I'd like it if people used them for me," Stoughton said.

In all cases, these are people – people with hopes and dreams, people who deserve to live with dignity without a risk to their lives.

Whether people are transgender, identify with the gender they were born as, or identify with neither or both, all deserve equal protection under the law.

They deserve respect as fellow human beings and the right to live by presenting the person they feel most comfortable as.

It's what we all deserve.

Sexual orientation shouldn't preclude giving blood; donations tested for disease

The Red Cross does not accept blood from gay men or from men who have had sexual contact with other men.

The FDA says those men might have come into contact with someone who has AIDS or is HIV-positive.

Gay men do compose the largest group of AIDS patients, but most practice safe, responsible sex. They, like all people, should be asked whether they have come into contact with the disease, but the admission of sexual relations with another man should not bar a donation.

The Red Cross claims to be critically low on blood. In fact, it was fined $4.2 million last month for failing to ask sufficient questions and test blood properly, according to the Washington Post.

The Red Cross cut corners in that respect, possibly accepting blood contaminated by malaria or mad cow disease. Why, then, would it turn away healthy donors?

Sure, a healthy gay man could lie about his HIV status; so could someone who recently has spent time in Africa. However, they shouldn't have to do so. Being gay is not synonymous with having AIDS.

When drives are administered correctly, all blood is tested for diseases, including HIV and AIDS, so the Red Cross shouldn't have to worry. In light of its recent shortcomings, though, maybe the Red Cross' concerns aren't about the integrity of the donors but about the integrity of its own workers.

True hangover cure?

By Eric Brown
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

According to research in the Annals of Internal Medicine, those experiencing hangovers can be a threat to themselves and others even after their blood alcohol levels have returned to normal.

Because of the reduced cognitive abilities that accompany a hangover, routine activities can be seriously affected. The research suggests that hangovers can potentially be more dangerous than actual inebriation.

In the quest for hangover prevention, Nutrimark, LLC, recently has uncovered its Hangover Prevention Formula (HPF). According to the HPF Web site, www.hangoverprevention.com, HPF is a natural dietary supplement that provides protection from the "morning after" symptoms experienced after prolonged or excessive alcohol consumption.

Gerald Stefanko, chief executive officer of Nutrimark, said taking one dose of the formula two hours before drinking will continue curing the drinker's hangovers for the next three days. The recommended HPF dose is one pill for alcohol consumers weighing less than 130 pounds and two pills for those weighing more than 130 pounds.

HPF contains a patented, all-natural extract, Tex-OC, derived from the fruit of the Prickly Pear Cactus. This extract accelerates the body's natural response to physical stressors like alcohol. Along with Tex-OC, HPF contains supplementary B vitamins, which prevent alcohol's depletion of vitamins necessary for proper nerve and muscle and cardiovascular functions.

Along with nutritional benefits, Stefanko said numerous clinical tests, including a double-blind, randomized study among 62 graduate medical students at Tulane University, have proved the extract's ability to protect the human body against various types of hangover symptoms.

"We are different than anything out there today. All other products released on the market are just that: remedies," Stefanko said. "Our product, Hangover Prevention Formula, is the only clinically proven hangover remedy. After 10 years of research, this is what we have come up with."

Bill Arck, director of Alcohol and Other Drug Education Service with University Counseling Services, said he had not heard of HPF. However, he is skeptical of the new formula.

"Let's just say I'm not going to invest my retirement funds into this company," Arck said.

In his years working at AODES, Arck said he has seen at least one new hangover-cure formula every six months, but he has yet to be impressed by any of them. Arck also said research has shown the best method to cure hangovers is one that's much cheaper than buying pills or formulas.

"There is too much good research that proves the best way to prevent hangovers is simply time," Arck said. "If you drink too quickly or drink

Players, psychos say no to those not worth time

JEREMY ROBERTS

You're at a bar, and you see her, that girl you're going to marry. She's your dream girl, she is the one, and you are convinced. You take a deep breath and stroll across the room, reciting over and over how you'll introduce yourself in hopes of not forgetting your own name in the heat of the moment. Seconds later your friends are watching painfully from across the room as you lower your head and quickly retreat like a scolded dog. Upon return, your friends offer several possible explanations for your massive failure.

1. YOU'RE A NERD

You fall apart like a house of cards in the middle of a hurricane whenever she is around. You lack any hint of sexual confidence. You might be confident in your ability to ride a unicycle, but you need to tune up your sexual confidence before you even think about getting beyond the friend status, if you make it that far.

2. SHE'S TAKEN

It happens all the time. I have a roommate who always seems to be hitting it off with some new girl he just met, and then she finally does the inevitable. She pulls the boyfriend card (and sometimes even the married card; not wearing wedding rings for free drinks and extra attention isn't uncommon). Avoid getting attached to a woman like this, and for your own sake, please clarify within the first 10 minutes of meeting her whether she is taken. Her telling you two weeks later is almost as much your fault for not asking. Don't assume anything.

3. SHE'S A PSYCHO

A bundle of emotional baggage just waiting to be picked up by you. Some women are naturally drawn to men who are bad for them. This often leads to them getting hurt and blaming all men for the pain they openly welcomed. You were doomed before you started. As long as you're a man, you will be considered the source of her pain and anger. Consider it a blessing she said no.

4. YOU'RE NOT WORTH HER TIME

Now that you've given her your two cents, she has had time to evaluate you and decided that two cents is all you're worth. If you dress like you don't have any fashion sense, money or even a little pride, then she is likely to think you aren't good enough for her. As bad as it sounds, most people are shallow (at least at first). But don't worry; someone is bound to think dressing just like your trash man is "modern."

5. SHE'S FRAGILE

"I'm taking a break from dating." When you hear this, it usually means she has been hurt and isn't looking to get seriously involved with anyone else anytime soon. It is best to either settle for friendship or wait it out and try again later when she has fully recovered. Be careful though; sometimes this excuse is just that, an excuse to not hurt your feelings when she is, in fact, looking to date someone who just happens to not be you.

6. SHE'S JUST NOT THAT INTO YOU

Sometimes it just isn't meant to be. Some people say you don't choose those to whom you are attracted. If she isn't attracted to you, then it's best that you move on and find someone who is.

7. SHE'S A PLAYER

She isn't a player in the sense that most guys are; she is more of an addicted flirter. She has no real interest in you other than getting you to stroke her ego. This is common in married women and women with low self-esteem who need proof they are still attractive. These girls are the hit-and-run equivalent of the dating world and will give you attention long enough to draw you in and then walk away.

8. YOU USED THAT LINE ONE TOO MANY TIMES

And so did the last 50 guys who used that witty one-liner you thought was really original. Next time don't try so hard. Asking her if she's tired because she's been running through your head all night will not result in you being tired that night.

9. SHE'S A SEX-PLOITER

She is one of those girls who thinks her body is the newest and greatest world wonder. She'll use the idea of you getting into her pants as leverage to get what she wants, which could be any number of things. These women are always in charge. Unless you're ready to give in completely and be the scapegoat for all her problems, I'd suggest you walk away.

10. MAYBE ANOTHER TIME

It could be just bad timing. She could be feeling unattractive that day, or it could just be bad timing because of her monthly cycle or any hormone-related reason. You might have said the right thing at the right place, but the timing wasn't right. You could run into her in a few days and everything would be different.

No matter what the reason, rejection isn't the end of the world. It's her loss anyway, right? But when you're done making excuses, get out there and try again. It can't possibly be worse than last time.

Jeremy Roberts is a senior in speech. Please send comments to edge@spub.ksu.edu.

HOROSCOPES

For today through Saturday

Aquarius

By midweek someone's showing eccentricities that nearly equal your own unparalleled, fun and funny individuality — a match made in heaven? Good times are ahead. From Friday through the weekend, the good just gets better — you're burning hot, and your love life really sizzles.

Aries

Making the first move is rarely a problem for you. Later in the week, you might even surprise yourself with boldness in the love department. Look out for some spontaneous combustion. As far as romantic matters this weekend, say it in a short and sweet way or say it with flowers.

Cancer

Whatever you start in the love department today can really take off — and if it's a little crazy, so much the better. Catch love fever, and it'll carry you into a weekend that finds you busting out of your shell in an inspiring way. A certain someone's likely to be impressed with your wild side.

Capricorn

Today is a day made for romance, and your sensual side definitely deserves to be indulged. Plan a great date or a fabulous night out with friends. This weekend, someone (your honey? A well-meaning, would-be romantic adviser?) has a lot to say, but you'll have to sort through it for the substance.

Gemini

Today gives you the opportunity to separate romantic fact from fiction. Ask the right questions, particularly of yourself. This weekend, you're a big flirt. If you're single, you go. If you're coupled up, confine those compliments and bat eyelashes at your sweetie, or at least make sure you have an understanding.

Libra

The way to hold on today is to let go; possessiveness doesn't become you. If you're single, on the other hand, someone sweet might be looking to hold onto you. This weekend, experiencing new things and talking and laughing about it afterward is a good idea. Plan a date accordingly.

Pisces

Today ought to bring some communication about exactly that. Initiate it yourself, and the results could look nice. Plan to stay busy enjoying the small, sweet parts of life and love this weekend; it's best to let the bigger things sort themselves out.

Leo

Your romantic role today is less obvious, and it might take a little effort to figure out the lesson that needs to be learned. Luckily, school's out and plain old fun is in this weekend. When you're busy enjoying yourself, you're extra hot.

Scorpio

The form today will take is largely dependent on you. Go after what you desire. This weekend, something in the love department that seems minor might end up being a big deal — or even a deal-breaker.

Sagittarius

Today is more about setting aside your own concerns to handle responsibilities and do a good deed for a loved one. It's all good as far as your karma's concerned. If your romantic efforts are thwarted this weekend by activities, at least you won't be bored.

Taurus

Today is a perfect day to act on your feelings. Shout your heart's desire from the rooftops, give a stranger flowers and go crazy for love. By the time the weekend arrives, you'll have plenty to think about — and you should think hard.

Virgo

By the middle of the week, you should have stuff squared away and be ready for a little romance — and it's ready for you, if your remarkable compatibility with someone is any indication. Talk about clicking. A little tandem soul-searching also can happen, making for lots of bonding. Watch what you say this weekend, though; it might seem logical to you, but someone else could be mystified.

Ole Miss pride stretches across the country. This family drove from Overland Park, Kan., for the game.

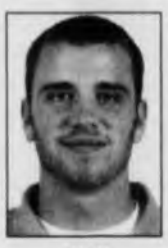
Road trip to the South

Ole Miss shows beauty of sports: togetherness

What I overheard

"We may not win every game, but we'll never lose a party."
■ It's impossible to argue with this one. The spirits were just as high after the loss as they were before.

"Most towns are football towns with a drinking problem. Well, we're a drinking town with a football problem."
■ The town definitely loves its alcohol, and the football team certainly has its struggles, but they almost seemed to take pride in this realization.



"Screw this. I'm going bow-hunting in the morning."
■ It was unsure what the guy really meant when he said this or what he was going to hunt. Maybe bow-hunting is a good anger management tool in the South.

"K-State will get to the Final Four in basketball within two years."
■ Just the fact that an Ole Miss student — someone who lives 10 hours away from Manhattan — said this has to get you excited. Bob Huggins obviously has brought a ton of exposure to K-State.

"Hey, pass me that shoe-shiner."
■ Yes, this quote did occur before game time. Something I never thought I would hear on the way to a tailgate, but it was a different atmosphere.

"That is what SEC football is all about: we run the ball, we pass the ball, we play good defense, and we make plays on special teams."
■ OK, so SEC football is all about dominating every facet of the game — funny it doesn't dominate the nation every season. This was said by a Georgia student.

"The South will rise again."
■ Kind of scary that this line is the last in one of the Ole Miss fight songs. K-State bans certain curse words, but Ole Miss gets to gloat about Civil War times?

NICK DUNN

OXFORD, Miss. – Hundreds of red and blue tents were nestled tightly on the 11 acres of grassy area that students call "The Grove." Dressed in ironed slacks, ties and dresses, students from Ole Miss and Georgia mingled while sipping beer and chewing on fried chicken, boiled peanuts and fresh grilled salmon.

Satellite dishes attached to the tents provided everyone with television coverage of the other Southeast Conference football games taking place as everyone waited for the 8 p.m. kickoff. Conversations in deep southern accents ranged from football to parties – as if the two were separate.

The place was Oxford, Miss., home of historic Ole Miss University. In Oxford, football is a party, and the celebration starts long before the players set foot on the field. The night before the game, thousands gathered outside The Grove – a large, tree-filled area in the center of campus about 1/4 of a mile from Vaught-Hemingway Stadium – armed with their tents, ready to run and lay claim to an ideal tailgating spot for the next day.

From there it was on to the Square, a literal square of bars and restaurants located just off campus, where students and alumni could prepare for the long day ahead. However, the pre-gameday festivities offered only a glimpse of the day to come.

When I woke up on Saturday morning, I realized I was definitely no longer in Kansas. Scattered throughout the house were about 15 Ole Miss and Georgia fans deciding what to wear to the game.

"How hard is it?" I thought to myself. "Just throw on an Ole Miss T-shirt and jeans, and you'll be ready to go."

At that moment, a guy walked out of the bathroom, neatly attired in slacks, a nice dress shirt and a red and blue bow tie – yes, a bow tie, a fashion statement I hadn't seen in years. At this game, I would apparently stick out for underdressing.

Students headed to The Grove as soon as they woke up, a good eight or nine hours before kickoff, to get started on a marathon of tailgating. Arriving at The Grove, it was truly a sight to behold.

"This is what Ole Miss does," a Rebel student told me as we approached The Grove. "We have The Grove. We know how to tailgate. This is our claim to fame."

There were people everywhere – eating, drinking, chatting, laughing. The craziest part was that it was hard to tell which team fans were supporting. Everyone was so dressed up that they meshed together as one giant blob of sophistication, with no hostility between opposing fans – Southern hospitality at its finest.

There was so much history, tradition and camaraderie. Those lucky enough to have a spot along the "Walk of Champions" – a brick sidewalk slicing through the middle of The Grove – were able to see and high-five the Rebel players who walked through the crowd two hours before kickoff.

At Ole Miss, the actual game almost seemed like a sideshow. The Rebels aren't good (1-4 this season), but you wouldn't know it from talking to the fans. Everyone was optimistic, joking about the misfortunes so far this season.

The crowd noise – a hard aspect of a game to judge – was probably less than what is heard on a typical Saturday at Snyder Family Stadium, but fans stayed until the end and never got discouraged.

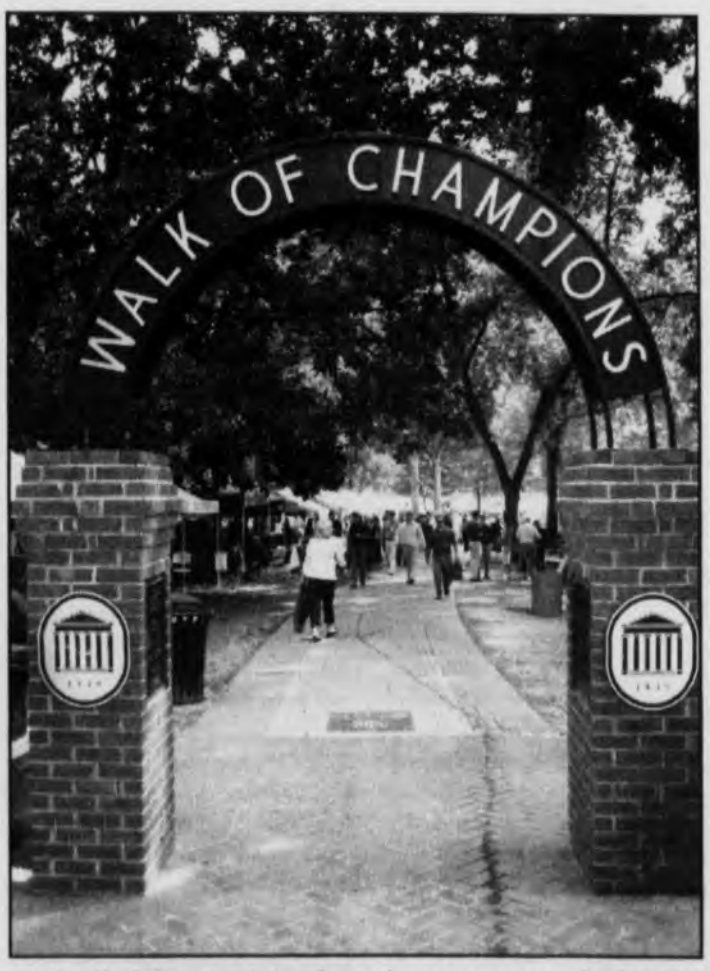
Georgia won 14-9 in a relatively exciting finish – a game that ended when Ole Miss quarterback Brent Schaeffer threw an interception on the Rebels' final possession.

"That's Ole Miss sports for you," another student said. "They get your hopes up only to let you down."

That was the most negative comment I heard all day, and even it was finished off with a laugh during the walk back to The Grove.

It was refreshing to see fans who appreciated football for what it should be – a chance to gather with friends and have a good time no matter the outcome of the game.

The weekend trip proved that no matter where you go, you get a different taste of sports. Each place offers its own tradition. The tradition at Ole Miss could be described as "better," but mostly it was just different – different in almost every way imaginable.



That's the beauty of sports. They bring people together. Even as an outsider from 10 hours away, I was accepted with open arms. Ole Miss students were quick to make me feel welcome and give me a little taste of what they are all about.

After all, maybe the saying I heard from everyone all weekend put it best: "We may not win every game, but we'll never lose a party."

The Ole Miss mascot, "Colonel Rebel," was banned from the field during games but can still participate in the "Walk of Champions."

VOL | Volleyball team swept in straight sets by Nebraksa

The K-State women's volleyball team found out first-hand Wednesday night why Nebraska is the No. 1-ranked team in the nation.

The undefeated Huskers (14-0, 6-0 Big 12) easily defeated K-State in Lincoln, Neb., sweeping the Wildcats (30-17, 30-22, 30-17).

It was the seventh-straight loss for the Wildcats (8-8, 0-6 Big 12), who have yet to record a Big 12 Conference win. K-State is in last place in the Big 12.

Senior outside hitter Sandy Werner and sophomore outside hitter Jenny Jantsch combined for 11 kills for the Wildcats, but it was not enough, as the Wildcats were outmatched by a Huskers team that pressured them all night.

In game one, K-State trailed 13-6 and 21-8 before losing 30-17. The Wildcats had a .065 hitting percentage and recorded just 10 total kills in the game. Nebraska sophomore outside hitter Jordan Larson had eight kills by herself in the first game.

The second game was much of the same for the Wildcats. With Nebraska holding an 11-9 lead, K-State sophomore middle blocker Megan Kroeker notched a kill to pull the Wildcats within one. However, K-State could not stay with the Huskers, and Nebraska used a 14-7 run to pull away and take the second game.

After the break, the Huskers continued their attack on the Wildcats, jumping to an early 9-1 lead in the third game. The Wildcats committed five attack errors during that stretch, three of which were credited to Jantsch. The Wildcats did not pull within five points the rest of the way and could not find an answer for Larson, who finished the match with a career-high 20 kills.

KIRKLAND, Wash. — Green Bay Packers wide receiver Koren Robinson was sentenced Wednesday to 90 days in jail for violating probation in a drunken driving case.

Robinson

Robinson appeared in Municipal Court in this Seattle suburb, where he pleaded guilty last year to drunken driving.

At the time, he was given a five-year sentence that was suspended on condition he not drink or have any other law violations.

The former first-round draft pick was then released by the Seattle Seahawks and signed by the Minnesota Vikings.

But Robinson was charged with drunken driving again after he was stopped for speeding in August in Minnesota near the Vikings' training camp, leading to Wednesday's hearing. He was released by the Vikings after that incident, and picked up by Green Bay last month.

Judge Robert McSeveney, a visiting judge from nearby Kent, sentenced Robinson to 90 days in jail, and said he could spend half of it on work-release.

Robinson must comply with the sentence by next March 1, when another court hearing is scheduled.

In addition to the 90-day jail sentence, Robinson is still subject to a possible suspension from the NFL. There has been no word yet from the league as to what sort of penalty, if any, it will hand out.

MLB | Bonds undergoes surgery to remove chips from left elbow

SAN FRANCISCO — Barry Bonds had surgery to remove bone chips from his troublesome left elbow that caused the San Francisco slugger pain and swelling throughout this season.

Bonds, who had the operation Monday, said he expects to be ready to resume his offseason workout regimen later this month.

"As soon as I heal in the next few weeks, I will begin my offseason training," Bonds said Wednesday in a posting on his Web site, www.barrybonds.com.

Meanwhile, Bonds' agent, Jeff Borris, said Wednesday he still hopes to begin discussions with the Giants soon about a new contract for Bonds. The 42-year-old Bonds is one of 11 potential free agents on the team, and general manager Brian Sabean is still in the process of evaluating who the club might want to bring back.

heavily for a long period of time without allowing your body the appropriate amount of time for the alcohol to work through your system, you'll get a hangover – period. It doesn't matter what kind of hangover-prevention supplements you use."

Arck said that to prevent hangovers, the appropriate amount of time for alcohol to fully work through one's body system is one hour per alcoholic beverage. Arck noted that one alcoholic beverage is a 12-ounce beer, a 5-ounce glass of wine or one shot of hard liquor. Arck also said that drinking 8 ounces of water for every alcoholic beverage contributes to a body's recovery.

Barbara Pearson, a licensed psychologist with Counseling Services, also expressed skepticism.

"I feel that the placebo effect sometimes plays a role when people feel that these hangover cures work," said Pearson.

The placebo effect is the phenomenon that a person's symptoms can be alleviated by an otherwise ineffective treatment, since the individual expects or believes that the treatment will work, Pearson said.

"Take, for example, if I were to be exercising with a personal trainer," Pearson said. "I might have been doing the same workout before on my own, but since I'm working out with a personal trainer, I would feel like I was now getting a better workout."

Pearson explained how she could test HPF.

"If I were to test this formula on 50 people, I would give 25 of them the actual formula and the other 25 people a sugar pill, telling them that it was the HPF formula. I can almost promise you that some of those 25 people who took the sugar pill would say that they felt better because of this placebo effect, or because they wanted to feel better," Pearson said.

"The mind-body connection is very strong. If we think positive or feel better mentally, our bodies will then feel better."

David Dick, junior in agriculture economics, said he is skeptical of HPF. He said he has never experimented with hangover cures, but he might give the formula a try.

"If it's really proven to work for three days, I would really be interested in trying it," Dick said.

"However, it would definitely depend on how much it costs, and I would also be concerned about the health issues. I think I would need to know more about the formula, especially if it's going to be in my body for supposedly three days."

Amanda Stanford, junior in psychology, said the formula sounds good, but she has heard from others that hangover cures or preventive medicines never work.

"I guess what makes me interested in HPF is what makes this hangover cure so much better than the others that don't work?" Stanford said.

VACCINE | Clinics won't see shortage of shots, officials say break for this flu season.

"They are being careful about predicting outbreaks, because in recent years they have announced outbreaks and nothing happened," Dickey-Wilson said.

Shortage concerns should not be an issue as Heideman said there are several million doses of the vaccine available.

"Vaccine manufacturers have reported that they do not anticipate vaccine shortages this year," Heideman said.

The local clinics and organizations that distribute the vaccine go directly through the manufacturer, Heideman said.

Inadequate supply happens because the vaccine is made in batches and not all at once. When one batch is produced, it gets shipped out to the distributors, and there is a period of time until the next batch is ready.

Some of the effects felt after the flu shot are soreness, fever and aches, Heideman said.

"There is a popular perception that if you get the flu shot, it will cause you to get the flu, but this is not true," he said.

change lower the fraternity's insurances costs, but also Price said it has improved living conditions and helped recruitment.

"The advantages outweigh the disadvantages of going dry," he said. "We love it, and I think we're going to stick with it from now on."

Despite the potential benefits of being a dry house, not everyone is lining up to adopt dry policies, and much of the counter-argument stems from the rights of older members to drink if they so choose.

"There's always talk," said Jay Knopf, president of Delta Chi fraternity. "I think most fraternities consider it at one point or another."

Delta Chi is still a wet house, meaning it allows alcohol, and Knopf, senior in landscape architecture, said there is no serious dialogue about changing the policy now, although he does concede some of the benefits.

Knopf said the house keeps its liabilities low by following campus drinking policies as well as its own house regulations, but for now, Delta Chi wants to retain members' drinking rights.

There is no universal policy applied to all chapters. Some ban alcohol outright; some allow permits for third-vendors and parties. Some, like Delta Sigma Phi, have nationally mandated dry policies, but can be granted exemptions if the fraternity meets criteria based on grade point average, disciplinary and financial grounds.

One house, Beta Sigma Psi, has found middle ground in its "damp" policy, which allows alcohol from Friday night through Sunday but bans it during the week.

Although many think a nation of dry fraternities is only a few years away, Pete Smithhisler, vice president for media and community relations for the North-American Interfraternity Conference, said the future is uncertain.

Smithhisler said many fraternities are not considering dry policies on a national level, and most of the policies are being implemented locally.

"I wouldn't call it a trend," he said.

Both Knopf and Cutler disagree with Smithhisler and said dry houses are a part of fraternities' future.

"It's only a matter of time before everybody's dry on a national level," Cutler said. "The chapters on this campus that have made that choice now are going to be ahead of that curve. They will have had the opportunity to work out the challenges and opportunities that come with these changes."

But for now, K-State and Greek Affairs allow fraternities to find their own path and do not apply pressure in either direction.

"We're in the job of helping them be successful with the choices they make," Jones said.

Children's author shares book, advice

Catrina Rawson | COLLEGIAN

Sue Stauffacher, children's book author, reads one of her books, "Donutheart," Wednesday evening at the Manhattan Public Library. "Donutheart" is Stauffacher's newest children's book.

By Megan Molitor
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sue Stauffacher, award-winning children's author, spoke Wednesday evening at the Manhattan Public Library.

Jennifer Adams, the library's children's department manager, introduced Stauffacher to an audience of people of all ages.

"She uses her book to encourage compassion," Adams said. "She works hard to unlock students' desire to read and write by consulting with teachers and parents."

Stauffacher has found recent success with her book, "Donuthead," which won a William Allen White award.

"Once I saw 'Donuthead', I had to read it," Adams said. "With a title like that, who could resist?"

Stauffacher allowed audience members to pick the topic of her discussion.

After showing her "kooky picture gallery," she explained the illustration process in "Donuthead."

"I used to say that I don't draw my own pictures, but after I decorated a blanket for a pediatric cancer ward, I decided maybe I could try," Stauffacher said. "Then I saw a book with a cool design, so I tried it. I took fabric and sewed it on paper, and I'm playing around with that idea right now."

Stauffacher said every book begins as an idea.

"I had to review a Harry Potter book for a newspaper, and after reading it for 30 hours straight, I called my editor to get the name for the slug to send it in," she said. "It had to be no longer than eight characters, so she told me to name it 'harrysue.' That's how I got the name for my book, 'Harry Sue'."

Besides "Harry Sue," Stauffacher has written "S'gana the Black Whale," her first book; "The Angel"; "Nothing but Trouble," which comes out next year; "Donuthead" and "Donutheart."

"I sold the movie rights to 'Donuthead,' and Nickelodeon asked for the rights to turn it into a series," she said.

"Donutheart" has not yet been released, but Stauffacher brought copies to share.

She also spoke about her comic books, which she began to write for children who are below the proper reading level.

"These kids aren't reading, because they can't; they're not reading because there's not enough material available to them that's interesting," Stauffacher said. "I wanted to give these kids the best comic book ever."

She has worked on the comic books for 10 years but has produced only three issues, as production is expensive.

Stauffacher also discussed her reasons for beginning a career as an author.

"I began because I loved reading," Stauffacher said. "I had a deep impulse and abiding love for it, and I want kids to love it as much as I do."

SGA approves 2 grants, supports total smoking ban

Despite senate resolution, city vetos total smoking ban

By Megan Moser
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Senate passed a resolution to support a total smoking ban in Manhattan at its meeting Sept. 28. On Tuesday, the City Commission voted down a complete smoking ordinance, instead moving one step closer to a partial ban.

The legislation prohibits smoking except between the hours of 9 p.m. and 5 a.m. at bars and certain types of establishments like pool halls and bowling alleys.

Tim Weninger, College of Engineering senator, likes a partial ban:

"I'm happy they passed a ban. I think it could have been more strict. For most K-State students, you're not going to see much of an effect.

"The one they ended up adopting was maybe a little bit too lenient. I think in the future they could tighten it up a bit. I'd like to see a statewide or nationwide ban.

"I would have made the times more restrictive, so there was more

Student Senate allocated money to two student groups at a short, 30-minute meeting Thursday.

The first went to the Society for Appreciation of Bharatiya Heritage and Arts for the purpose of bringing a group of Indian dancers to K-State.

The dancers, Sreyashi Dey, Nalini Prakash, Manoranjan Pradhan and Vijay Palaparty, will perform a style of dance called Yugma, which means "together" in Sanskrit. The dance combines two traditional styles of Indian dance, Odissi and Bharatnatyam. SABHA requested $5,000 for the

Every day, Tiffany Kellum gets 9.6 fluid ounces of vitamin C-rich juice and 3.2 cups of milk. In the course of a month she receives 36 ounces of iron-fortified cereal, two dozen eggs and one pound of either dried beans or peas, or 18 ounces of peanut butter.

These are the benefits of the current food package of the Special Supplemental Nutrition Program for Women, Infants and Children. This is what Kellum, sophomore in psychology and pre-law, has received since July. She expects to give birth to a baby girl this December and will continue receiving food packages after that.

WIC provides low-income pregnant women like Kellum, as well as breastfeeding and postpartum women, infants and children up to age 5 with nutritious supplemental foods.

Last month, the U.S. Department of Agriculture announced a change to the guidelines for the WIC food allowance, saying WIC recipients will get less milk, cheese and eggs and instead will receive more fruits, vegetables and whole-grain bread.

Kellum thinks the program and its upcoming changes are positive steps.

"They don't give you real fruits so far, so it would be very beneficial to get your vitamins through real vegetables and fruits," she said.

Kellum said she also appreciates the new rule of eventually being able to get bread as well. She said WIC should offer bread and at least some type of meat for protein. She said bread is not cheap, especially whole-grain bread.

WIC's current food packages were designed in the early 1970s to supplement participants' diets with foods rich in vitamins A and C, calcium, iron and protein, because, at that time, WIC's target group lacked those nutrients.

"Since the WIC program's inception in 1974, the WIC food package changes have been minimal, while many changes have occurred including advances in nutrition knowledge and its application," said Mike Heideman, communications design specialist of Kansas Department of Health.

In addition, the WIC program has grown dramatically and now serves a more culturally diverse population, he said. The proposed changes follow recommendations made by the National Academies of Sciences' Institute of Medicine and the latest nutrition science, as well as the 2005

Sale of 1,500 pink shirts funds search for breast cancer cure

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Pink shirts that prominently display the phrase "Tough Enough to Wear Pink" are promoting breast cancer awareness across campus.

A T-shirt sale and other events promoting October's Breast Cancer Awareness Month are sponsored by the Collegiate Cattlewomen and Sigma Alpha. Profits from the $10 T-shirts go to the Mid-Kansas Susan G. Komen Breast Cancer Foundation.

Students will have their last opportunity to purchase the pink T-shirts at 11:30 a.m. Friday in front of Weber Hall. A free barbecue also will be provided in front of Weber, and anyone wearing their pink tees will be eligible for various door prizes. A representative from the Susan G. Komen Breast Cancer Foundation will be at the event, and information about breast cancer will be available.

Megan Sramek, co-chair of Sigma Alpha's fundraising committee and junior in agricultural business, said the groups are hoping to increase interest and knowledge about breast cancer.

Sramek said pre-orders for T-shirts were taken before the sale, but the interest shown has been overwhelming.

"It's been just a wonderful response to it," she said.

T-shirts were on sale in the K-State Student Union Wednesday and Thursday. By the middle of the sale Wednesday, Sramek said the group had raised about $1,500. The slogan "Tough Enough to Wear Pink" originated at the 2005 Wrangler National Final Rodeo.

Kelsey Patterson, junior in agricultural business, said she wanted to buy a T-shirt to support breast cancer research. Patterson said the mother of her best friend in high school had breast cancer, and she knows the importance of backing the cause.

At noon Thursday, Krysten Schott, senior in animal science and agricultural economics, said the groups had about 90 shirts left to sell.

"There was line before we opened today," Schott said.

Schott said the group had pre-ordered 850 shirts, but there were so many pre-orders, 650 additional shirts were ordered. By the end of Thursday's sale, the group had sold all of the 1,500 they had ordered.

After the group thought of the fundraiser last year, Schott said the sale became a trend on campus.

"Now we have guys wearing pink," she said.

Christopher Hanewinckel | COLLEGIAN
Lindsay Ruddick, graduate student in marriage and family therapy, checks the size of one of the few remaining shirts with the slogan "Tough Enough to Wear Pink." All 1,500 shirts sold out, and proceeds went to breast cancer research.

New cafe facilitates friendships through common table

By Kristina Monroe
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan's Fourth Street has been a little busier in the last four months, thanks to the 4th Street Cafe.

4th Street Cafe, located just south of Poyntz Avenue on Fourth Street, opened its doors during the last week of May.

Christie Cady, the cafe's owner, said she wanted her cafe to have an urban feel.

"I wanted people to feel at home, like they could talk to the people next to them," Cady said.

Cady said the idea of getting strangers talking inspired the "large table." In the center of the cafe is a large, rectangular table where the staff seats strangers together. Cady said she is proud of the many friendships that have resulted from people meeting in her cafe.

"About three weeks ago a gentleman sat down, ordered the special and ate, then when he got up to pay, he paid for everyone in the restaurant," Cady said.

4th Street Cafe's menu offers specialty sandwiches, salads, baked goods and a full espresso bar. Cady created all the recipes found on the menu.

"The pesto turkey club is our best seller, but I get the most comments on the chicken salad," she said.

All of the cafe's recipes are whole food recipes.

"I try to get things made the way they were 40 years ago. It's not low-fat, but it's the way it's supposed to be," Cady said.

She said she would like to see a wider variety of patrons.

"I'd like to see more college students in here," she said. "Students are always welcome to come in to study."

Cady and her staff are working to develop ideas for the evening hours.

"Right now we are only open until four, but I would like to extend that," she said. "I have all kinds of ideas like salsa dancing or pizza night – my husband likes to make pizzas."

The midday fare is popular with customers.

"It was the best lunch I've had in a while," said Charlene McClurney, a Topeka resident and first-time 4th Street Cafe customer.

Julie and Larry Britton, Manhattan residents, eat lunch Wednesday at the 4th Street Cafe. Larry eats lunch at the restuarant daily.

Catrina Rawson
COLLEGIAN

Cady said she is excited about the future of her cafe.

"I love my customers; it's really what makes me get up in the morning," she said.

Representative resigns after inappropriate behavior comes to light

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., resigned last week because of a scandal involving inappropriate dialogues with certain Congressional pages.

According to several news sources, Foley communicated with the 16- and 17-year-old pages through e-mail and instant message exchanges.

The scandal has unleashed a hailstorm of accusations of who knew what, when, and why no one in Congress reported it. Speaker of the House Dennis Hastert and other colleagues of Foley have been accused of withholding information involving Foley's indiscretions.

James Franke, associate professor in political science, said the scandal is an embarrassment for Congress and will hurt the Republican Party, especially within the party's religious sect.

"I think this is going to continue to contribute to the erosion of confidence in the Congress," Franke said.

Local members of Congress have called the scandal a disgrace to anyone involved. Rep. Jerry Moran, R-Kan., said more action should have been taken.

"I expect Speaker Hastert to clearly outline what he knew, when he knew it and determine whether things were handled appropriately," Moran said. "If the investigation uncovers any wrongdoing by any member of Congress, they should resign immediately."

Robert Shoop, professor in educational leadership, said steps need to be taken to ensure pages are informed of Congressional misconduct. Members of Congress also need to be aware of any inappropriate actions and report them immediately.

"People need to realize there is a power difference between those in power and their subordinates," Shoop said. "Everyone has the obligation to notice those behaviors and report them when the time comes."

Read columnist Owen Kennedy's opinion about the Foley scandal on Opinion, Page 4.

He said Congress has considered removing the page program, but he also said that solution would only be a quick fix to a larger problem.

TO THE POINT

Show you care about a cure for cancer

Today is a day to wear pink.

No, it's not a day for little girls, but one for adults. Breast cancer awareness month is a time to show you care about finding a cure.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

While the awareness part lasts all month, and should last all year, K-State chose this week to show it cares, and students responded. With 1,500 "Tough enough to wear pink" shirts sold, it proves K-State does care.

Even more impressive, Krysten Schott, member of sponsoring organization Sigma Alpha, said men have ordered shirts. For some men pink might be too feminine, but it's nice to know they're tough and will wear it for a good cause.

According to www.thebreastcancersite.com, 182,000 women and 1,600 men are diagnosed with breast cancer each year. Of these women, 43,300 will die. Of these men, 400 will die.

To end the week, there will be a free barbecue for those concerned about finding a cure for breast cancer. All students should attend and wear either their new "Tough enough to wear pink" shirts or any other pink shirt.

Some of us have family members or friends with breast cancer, so take a moment this month to remember and support them.

A better fence

Illegal immigration burdens American society finacially

RYAN SPENCER

Most people go home after work on Fridays. Not the U.S. Congress – it stays behind and slips legislation by at the last minute, hoping to get things pushed through before election season starts.

Last Friday night it was immigration reform. The proposed reform: a fence.

In the end, the measure to start construction on a 700-mile stretch of fence was passed 80-19 (with only Sen. Edward Kennedy abstaining).

This is a good first step. This is a problem at home that has gotten out of hand. This free flow of people illegally entering the country is a threat to our security and our resources.

Trust me, I've heard all the arguments in the book. "They do the work Americans won't do" is my favorite. Have you asked Americans? Do you know they won't do it? Have you given them the chance to do it?

Come on a journey with me, and let's take a look at the cost of illegal immigration.

In Arizona alone, illegal immigrants cost taxpayers $1 billion annually in school expenses, welfare, medical care and anchor babies.

Seventy-five percent of the drugs in the United States come from Mexico, while $80 billion is spent annually on the failed war on drugs. Illegal immigrants make up 30 percent of our prisoners, costing us $1.6 billion annually.

"Ryan, they do hard work and pay taxes they shouldn't have to, right?" Maybe, but $56 billion is sent back to Mexico every year by illegals enjoying free health and medical care.

Is your blood boiling yet? It should be, because this is a huge problem that would free up a lot of money being thrown down the drain, literally.

Speaking of where this money goes, throughout all the debate and discussion I've heard on this topic, I have not once heard anyone ask the big question: why do Mexicans have to risk their lives and the lives of their families to sneak into the United States for a better life? Anyone?

The answer from the left would be the "lack of resources" in Mexico, and how the United States has stripped it of its power by being the only superpower in the region. They would be wrong (again).

Mexico has a huge natural resource many don't think of: oil. Anyone remember the huge new oil fields Mexico found off its coasts? Probably not, because Vicente Fox doesn't want it to be known. No one has asked what the Mexican government is doing, nobody has asked what Mexico can be doing to help its impoverished people, and no one asks Mexico to help its citizens create a better life for themselves in their own country. If Mexico had a stable government that was doing its job, immigration would not be a problem.

Illustration by Ashley Burks | COLLEGIAN

But for now, a fence will have to do. I know it's not a permanent fix, but at least we're heading in the right direction. In addition to money for the fence, the bill includes $380 million to hire 1,500 more Border Patrol agents and money to build detention facilities to hold 6,700 more illegal immigrants before they are deported. All of this will only help the United States, and until Mexico starts to help itself, we are the only ones we can depend on.

Disgraced Congressman refuses to take the blame

OWEN KENNEDY

We live in a time and society in which we blame as many people as we can for problems, without claiming some responsibility of our own. This is no more clear than when demonstrated by those in the public eye, and Rep. Mark Foley is no different.

By now, most of you have heard about the Florida Republican's scandal involving salacious instant messages and e-mails to male, teenage Congressional pages. The 52-year-old resigned from his seat in the House of Representatives last week after news of his conduct was reported by ABC.

There was outrage, from Democrats and Republicans and conservatives and liberals alike over such messages, and President Bush said he was disgusted with Foley's actions. But rather than saying he is wrong and will deal with his problems, Foley announced early Tuesday that he was seeking help for alcoholism.

What? Did you think he was going to take sole responsibility for his actions? Pssh, don't make him laugh.

But after Foley made this announcement, some of his acquaintances expressed doubts about his "alcoholism."

According The Associated Press on Yahoo.com, some of those who know Foley said they rarely ever saw him drink and were skeptical about his statement. Just like Mel Gibson, he blames the booze for his situation. Gibson said he made anti-Semitic comments because of his alcoholism, just like why Foley made his mistakes.

But unlike Gibson, Foley's excuse soon was all but disproved. Well, who to blame next?

Foley's lawyer announced this week that the Congressman had been molested by a clergyman when he was a teenager, according to the Miami Herald.

Are you serious, Mark? I understand you want to place blame in as many places as possible, but to blame a clergyman? He can't find anyone else to blame, so he'll try to make the church look bad. It's like throwing dirt on someone with a black eye.

Even better than blaming the clergy, Foley announced Wednesday that he is gay, according to The Associated Press.

Wow. What was going through his head when he made that statement? "I'm gay. That's why I want to exploit children and molest boys. Because I'm gay." Yeah, that's the ticket.

Alcohol, the church and homosexuality. Did Foley miss anyone? Did anyone not get blamed? I guess he could have tried to blame some ethnic minority for his problems, but other than that, he successfully made it look like he is in this situation because of others' actions.

Hopefully some leaders in Washington – if there are any left – will be different than Foley and do more than point fingers. If they do their jobs, maybe Foley will get the help and punishment he needs and deserves. I won't keep my fingers crossed though.

Speakers tell story of African AIDS orphans

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Dr. Scott Todd, international health specialist for Compassion International, speaks about how AIDS has affected people around the world during the "Orphans and AIDS: What Would Jesus Do?" lecture Thursday evening at Grace Baptist Church.

Lyndsay Born
COLLEGIAN

The global AIDS pandemic was the topic of a lecture sponsored by Acting On AIDS Thursday night at Grace Baptist Church.

Featured speakers Solange Uwituze, graduate student in animal science and industry, and Dr. Scott Todd, international health specialist for Compassion International, spoke about children in Africa and the effects of AIDS.

"The thing that's keeping us so trapped is the judgementalism and condemnation," Todd said of the AIDS pandemic.

Nearly one-fifth of children are orphans in Rwanda, Uwituze said, and one-fourth of the population was living with AIDS as late as 2005.

"I survived to be a twinkling star in the midst of the darkness of the world," she said.

Uwituze's father and younger and older brothers all were killed after the president of Rwanda's plane was shot down and the country erupted into civil war, she said.

She said she did not go to school for a full bachelor's degree because she didn't believe in the future.

"I went for an associate's degree rather than lose everything," Uwituze said.

She then tutored and mentored orphans raised in an orphanage in Ngoma, Butare, she said.

When Uwituze discovered that some orphans living on the street were going to be taken away by the police, she allowed many to live in her house for more than a month.

All the orphans were later adopted by Italian families.

There are about 250 children with AIDS in Butare, she said, and they are in need of health insurance, food, schooling, shelter, clothing and friendship.

The children benefit from their faith, she said.

"The need to know that there is that person that AIDS can't kill," Uwituze said.

The organizer of the event, Josh Hersh, junior in speech communication, brought Acting on AIDS to the K-State campus.

"God just struck something in my heart and said this is something that needs to be at K-State," he said.

From the Public Editor:

Profanity doesn't belong in newspaper reaching for its best

LOGAN C. ADAMS

A handful of people recently have told me they disapprove of a certain adjective in a story that ran on the front page on Sept. 25. The word, which starts with "sh" and rhymes with "ditty," was quoting a sign that compared the City of Manhattan's leaders to feces.

One reader pointed out that while the "s" word appeared in its full glory, another story printed "f---" the week before. In this case, it was a noun in a chant, rhyming with "chuck," that referred to a quantity K-State fans promised to beat out of an opposing football team.

Editor in chief Emily Lawrence defended both decisions, saying the "s" word was in a quote; that is, not the words of a Collegian writer but the political speech of a storeowner facing eminent domain. She said a picture of the sign would have been printed as well, had the image not been lost due to a computer failure.

The "f" word, however, was just an expletive in a false threat against athletes uttered by fans standing behind stadium security.

News editor Leann Sulzen told me much thought went into the decision, and the editors believed the storeowner's situation warranted printing the word.

The context argument is reasonable, but it is not unreasonable for our readers to dislike vulgarity. I was shocked to read the "s" word the morning it was published and would not have printed it myself.

I don't want to read that word in my morning newspaper, and I am not alone in that sentiment.

In the interest of full disclosure, I have been known to use both words frequently in conversation and Internet rants. Sorry, Grandma.

But the fact that I, and many others, use these curses and others in speech does not make them worthy of being printed. Writing demands the best of human language, not the sludge at the bottom.

Neither the story nor the sign's statement would have been weakened had the Collegian printed "s----y." Every reader would have known what it meant and how the sign's writer felt.

Granted, this is a college paper with standards and an audience different from your normal community publication, but that doesn't mean we should settle for what is common. We should pursue the ideal.

Along these lines, the appropriateness of some of the images and topics printed in the Collegian deserve some thought.

For example, I've heard complaints about advertisements for Mustang Gentleman's Club. The ads are disliked because they feature photographs of the club's entertainers in costume, or the lack thereof.

Beth Ramsey, English instructor, told me she had to tear out the ads before giving them to students from Saudi Arabia last semester to practice reading English. She said the Muslim students would have considered it a sin to view the pictures. She said our standards should be higher.

Collegian advertisements are not decided by its editors, but by the advertising staff.

Ad Manager Kelly Williams told me there have been complaints about the ads in the past, but not this semester. He said the ads have been less explicit this semester, but there are things that would not be allowed in advertisements, and Mustang ads have required alteration before.

A few readers have said they don't like racy pictures in their paper or stories promoting premarital sex. Then again, one reader requested a swimsuit issue, so I can't claim to know what our readers want – yet.

I would, however, if you all spoke up. You know how to find me.

Men must embrace concept of social responsibility

Editor,

I'm writing in response to both a letter from Mary Todd and the call for more minority feedback. I'm a man, and I'm black.

A concept like "social responsibility" has become unpopular for my generation, particularly for men. We don't feel like we owe anyone anything. But I'm a guy who's a part of a campus.

There are 24,000 people here, half of whom are women. I don't have a responsibility to make sure that all of those people are happy, but just maybe, I have a responsibility to make sure that I don't endanger them or knowingly allow someone else to endanger them.

I don't drive through campus in the middle of the day drunk, and I don't let my friends do it. It's a small inconvenience, given my propensity for daytime drinking, but it's about other people. All I think is being asked are two things. One: guys, don't rape people, and if you don't understand what all that entails, look it up (www.ksu.edu/womenscenter).

And two, help isolate those guys who feel it's OK to drug girls or get them drunk to take advantage of them.

The women on this campus aren't our enemies; they're a part of K-State just like we are. You don't need to love all of them, or even like them, to realize they don't deserve to be victims any more than we do.

You don't need to change the world, just your small part of it.

Students can aid United Way in providing local services

Editor,

The United Way of Riley County fundraising campaign is under way. K-State's role in this campaign is important. The money raised here on campus, from the faculty and staff, accounts for 17 percent of the overall total. Sixteen local agencies receive assistance through the United Way.

The K-State Child Development Center, which provides quality, affordable childcare to not only the members of the K-State family but the community as well, is a new agency to receive funding this year. Low-income community residents are able to secure quality childcare because of the United Way funding allocated to the center.

Our community is growing. With that growth, the need for the services provided by the United Way agencies will grow as well. Last year, agencies directly helped more than 25,000 Riley County residents. That number is sure to grow, so it is essential that we all come together and support the United Way.

The annual community-wide United Way Radio-thon event is Wednesday. The event will be broadcast from 6 a.m. to 6 p.m. on the Manhattan Broadcasting stations, KMAN 1350 AM, K-ROCK 101.5, B104.7 and Z93.3. Request a song in exchange for a United Way donation, or bid on "local celebrity" challenges and radio auction items, like a ride on a Harley at the K-State Harley Day ride (Nebraska game). Check out www.ksu.edu/unitedway for more details.

The K-State United Way fundraising effort is aimed at faculty and staff. Get your UW packet returned before Oct. 16 in order to qualify for the "Early Bird" drawing. If students want to be involved in United Way but dollars are scarce, we suggest you get involved by volunteering at one of the local agencies. They would love your help, and you will gain from the community service involvement.

Wildcats look to break streak against Colorado

By Jeffrey Rake
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's volleyball team certainly did not expect this.

Twenty-six days ago, the Wildcats (8-8, 0-6 Big 12) were 8-1 overall and had just defeated then No. 23-ranked Notre Dame in the Northern Iowa Tournament. During that stretch, the Wildcats beat five teams 3-0 and three others 3-1. The Wildcats were the No. 24-ranked team in the nation and had momentum going into Big 12 Conference play.

All of that has changed.

The Wildcats have lost seven-straight matches, six of them coming to conference opponents, and find themselves in last place in the Big 12 heading into their match against Colorado on Saturday night.

It is the longest losing streak the Wildcats have had since 1993.

If the Wildcats hope to avoid falling below .500, they will have to defeat a Colorado team that has won seven of its last nine matches.

The Buffaloes (8-5, 4-2 Big 12) are led by junior outside hitter Amber Sutherland, who leads the team with 193 kills and averages 3.04 digs per game. Sutherland was named Big 12 Player of the Week for the week of Sept. 18, and she should create problems for the Wildcats.

Colorado's attack revolves around senior Ashley Nu'u, a player with whom K-State coach Suzie Fritz is familiar. Fritz coached Nu'u during the offseason on the USA Volleyball A2 Team in New Orleans. Nu'u has 527 assists (11.98 per game) on the season.

The Wildcats are led statistically by senior outside hitter Sandy Werner and junior libero Angie Lastra. Werner leads the team with 224 kills, and Lastra – who has 323 digs on the season – averages a Big 12-best 5.3 digs per game.

Sophomore Megan Kroeker has emerged as one of the Big 12's best middle blockers. She ranks fifth in the Big 12 in blocks per game (1.46) and has a team-best .314 hitting percentage. Her 83 total blocks are more than any other Wildcat.

K-State has won seven of the last 10 meetings against Colorado. The home team has won the last four matches in the series.

Catrina Rawson | COLLEGIAN

Junior libero Angie Lastra leads the Big 12 Conference averaging 5.3 digs per game. K-State plays Colorado at 7 p.m. on Saturday at Ahearn Field House.

Religion should not be forced on athletes, especially at public universities

SCOTT GIRARD

Aspects of religion have been seen in sports for ages. Players thank God for allowing them to score a touchdown, but never thank him for a fumble. Some teams say a prayer before games for good fortune, and the list goes on.

Although these people claim their religiosity assists in their achievements, religion is not necessary for athletic success.

A recent article from The Kansas City Star claims Deb Patterson, the K-State women's basketball head coach, habitually used religion as a regular part of practice.

According to the story by The Star's K-State women's basketball beat writer, Mechelle Voepel, a practice known as "chapel" took place before every pre-game meal. The session apparently included biblical teachings from a pastor and film clips. Patterson said the special session was never mandatory, but several former players have different views.

One former player, who was not identified, said in the article the messages were usually good messages, but when the players did not show up on time to "chapel," they got in trouble.

According to the article, Patterson isolated players, giving all but two players crucifix necklaces. The others received bookmarks.

There is no way I can confirm these claims, but I do trust The Star as a reliable source.

Whatever the event, religion should not be forced upon or alienate people. What if Kareem Abdul-Jabbar was not allowed to play in the NBA or Muhammad Ali was not allowed to go into the boxing ring just because they converted to Islam?

Religion obviously is not a prerequisite to athletic success and is no reason to shun players, especially at a public university. Players work hard to get to the top level of competition. Whether they are Christian, Muslim, agnostic or whatever, they are no less of an athlete.

According to The Star, Patterson said in the Fellowship of Christian Athletes magazine that she talked personally to her staff to help build the program on "godly principles." This might be the reason several players and coaches have left the program over the past few years.

Recently she agreed in principle to a five-year contract extension through the 2010-11 season.

There is no question Patterson has elevated the women's basketball program to a status not seen in a decade. She has the second-highest win total in K-State history and coached the team to a No. 2 ranking during the 2002-03 season. On the other hand, she has had several question marks in her tenure. Her teams have not lived up to expectations for several years, and now she has off-the-court problems.

K-State needs to look at not only the performance on the court but also the relationships off it. The claims in The Star article are serious and need to be investigated by the university. K-State is not a religious university. Its job is to accept the most deserving students – from the women's basketball team to the K-State student ambassadors – on the basis of performance and record, not faith.

4 K-State tennis players travel to Indiana for Hoosier Classic

By Jessi Hernandez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's tennis team will face tough competition this weekend at the Indiana Hoosier Classic in Bloomington, Ind.

Among the teams participating is Notre Dame, which finished last season ranked fifth in the nation. It is led by senior Catrina Thompson, who is 22nd in the Intercollegiate Tennis Association preseason rankings. Indiana, Kansas, LSU and Murray State also will be playing.

In addition to Thompson, two other players with preseason rankings will compete in the tournament: Brook Buck of Notre Dame, who is ranked 66th, and Ksenia Bukina of Kansas, who is ranked 115th.

With more teams competing, the Classic is structured differently than last weekend's K-State Invitational.

"I think there are four draws, so each player, according to their ranking on the team, competes in a different draw," assistant coach Marcos Mendez said. "Viviana (Yrureta) I think will go to the top draw."

Yrureta will compete in the "Flight A" draw of the tournament and will face Indiana's Brianna Williams today. Also competing for K-State are sophomore Katerina Kucklackova, who will compete in the "Flight C" draw, and junior Tereza Prochazkova and freshman Natasha Vieira, both of whom will compete in the round-robin pools.

Mendez said four of K-State's players are traveling to Bloomington, because the others are either injured or recovering from injuries. Head coach Steve Bietau also stayed behind, Mendez said, to work with the remaining players.

The Classic should provide an opportunity for the Wildcats to improve their game against tougher competition, Mendez said.

"I think this is going to be a very quality season for us," he said. "This is our second tournament, so we have a lot to see right now. We have the whole year to improve our playing, so it's just good to see what they're capable of, testing them, and seeing how they respond to the competition."

Where to watch the Wildcats this season

Porter's Bar Report Card:
Atmosphere: B
Food selection: D
Drink (choices): B
Entertainment: B

Considering that it burned down only a few years ago, it's amazing Porter's Bar is even in existence today. Actually, it's doing quite well.

Above all else, Porter's, 706 N. Manhattan Ave., is a bar. The bar itself runs nearly the full length of the restaurant and offers plenty of seating, but the real attraction is what can be found behind the bar.

Porter's offers nine beers on tap and has just about every variety of hard liquor available. This means there should be something to suit almost every K-State fan. Unfortunately, the menu is a different story.

Porter's has one of the most limited menus around, consisting of only three appetizers, soup and salad, and a few varieties of sandwiches. The menu is unlikely to cater to all appetites, and, in fact, might not cater to any.

In terms of entertainment, Porter's stacks up evenly against most Aggieville bars. There are six televisions inside and two more overlooking the outdoor patio. While this doesn't sound like a lot, the positioning of televisions and the size of the establishment ensure everyone can see the game no matter where they sit.

In addition to televisions, Porter's also has a Golden Tee golf game, a dart board and a touch-screen gaming system. With the way K-State has been playing lately, these alternative entertainment options might come in handy.

A final reason to give Porter's a chance on game day is the atmosphere. Porter's has a sleek and sophisticated, yet fun feel to it that guarantees a good time. Plus, it's always full of true K-State fans.

FBC | Offensive lineman Boss leaves K-State football program

Football coach Ron Prince announced Thursday afternoon that sophomore offensive lineman Matt Boss has decided to leave the K-State football program.

Boss

"Matt expressed to me that he no longer has an interest in playing football or attending Kansas State and has decided to return home," Prince said. "We would have liked to see him stay and at least finish out the academic semester at K-State, but he has opted to do otherwise, and we wish him the best of luck with his future endeavors."

Boss, a native of Cherryvale, Kan., who red-shirted as a true freshman in 2004, started the opening two games of the 2005 season, but he was slowed by an injury against North Texas last season and was able to make just one more appearance — a start at Nebraska in the second-to-last game of the year — the rest of the season.

This season, Boss has appeared in just one game, seeing time as a reserve in K-State's 45-0 win over Florida Atlantic on Sept. 9.

FBC | Texas, Oklahoma governors place bets on Red River Shootout

OKLAHOMA CITY — Oklahoma Gov. Brad Henry and Texas Gov. Rick Perry have made a friendly wager on the upcoming game between Oklahoma and Texas.

The governor whose team loses will donate a basket of goods from his state to a charitable organization of the winning governor's choice. The wager is a long-standing tradition between the governors of the two states.

Henry said he expects the No. 14 Sooners to win Saturday at the Cotton Bowl in Dallas. It will be the 101st meeting between the teams. Texas, ranked No. 7, won last year after dropping five straight in the series.

"I have unwavering confidence that coach (Bob) Stoops and our Sooners will make Saturday a triumphant one for the Crimson and Cream," said Henry, who received his undergraduate and law degree from OU.

Perry disagrees with that assessment.

"I have no doubt that coach (Mack) Brown and the Longhorns will make it two in a row over the Sooners this Saturday in Dallas," he said. "Fortunately, OU's trip across the Red River won't be for nothing. They can get a look at the Longhorns' national championship trophy while they are in Texas."

3 school shootings occur across nation within 1 week

By Allison Voris
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A string of violent crimes in schools has the nation wondering about the motives behind such attacks.

"Unfortunately, there are a lot of different reasons why people engage in this kind of violent behavior," said Anthony Jurich, professor of marriage and family therapy. "There are so many complicated reasons, but there is no 'the' reason."

The events began last Wednesday when a gunman took six girls hostage in a Bailey, Colo., high school. The gunman, Duane Morrison, a 54-year-old man who was living out of his truck, fatally shot one of the hostages before taking his own life.

Two days later in Cazenovia, Wis., 15-year-old high school freshman Eric Hainstock, allegedly shot and killed his principal, John Klang, 49, a day after Klang punished him for having tobacco. Hainstock complained about being teased and bullied by other students.

On Monday, Charles Carl Roberts IV became the third gunman to assault a school in less than a week when he attacked a small one-room Amish school in Lancaster County, Pa. Roberts tied together 10 female hostages before allegedly opening fire on them and then killing himself.

"Since I plan on becoming a teacher, the recent attacks have left me wondering if our schools are really safe," Kimberlie McClellan, junior in secondary education, said. "I also wonder how anyone could ever do something as horrible as going into a school and killing the children inside."

When students are the attackers in cases of violence in schools, it is common for the attacker to have felt victimized by their classmates prior to the incident, Jurich said. They feel violence is a way for them to even the score with their bullying classmates.

"We know because of research and investigation into cases that when we're talking about students who commit those kinds of crimes in schools, many times they are students that have been bullied," said Jim Rodman, Greenbush Director of Crisis Intervention for participating school districts at the Southeast Kansas Education Service Center. "They feel it's their only way of recourse."

When school violence is brought on by an intruder who is not a student, as in the cases in Pennsylvania and Colorado, there is no way to profile the attackers.

"These cases vary so much that you can't really set up a profile," said Michelle Bemiller, assistant professor in sociology, anthropology and social work. "The only thing that we have found almost across the board in these types of cases is that the attacker is male."

One possible reason these attackers take part in these violent crimes is because it gives them recognition and fairness, Jurich said.

"These people may feel that life is unfair or people are unfair to them," Jurich said. "They are somebody who feels disenfranchised, who feels the only way to feel recognized or like the score is evened is to do something very violent."

Schools have taken a number of different precautions to ensure the safety of their students. School buildings are more secure, often with metal detectors, making it more difficult for students to bring in weapons. Many schools also are adopting policies requiring clear backpacks and uniforms and providing different anti-bullying, mentoring and educational programs to help prevent violent behavior, Rodman said.

Even though there seems to have been a large amount of violence in schools in the past week, parents should not worry about sending their children to school, Rodman said.

"Schools are still a very safe place," Rodman said. "We've had three episodes in the last week, but we must remember there are literally thousands of schools in the United States with millions of students who have been going to school all week with no problems."

Citizens, officials discuss freedom of government information

By Jesse Sachdeva
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Are we safer in the dark?

This was the title question posed at a forum on freedom of government information at the Manhattan Public Library Thursday night.

Sponsored by the Kansas Humanities Council and the KSU Institute for Civic Discourse and Democracy, the forum is the first in a series, titled "Democracy Dialogues 2006," to take place throughout Kansas in the next month. Last night's forum was designed to gauge public opinion on the availability of government documents and decreasing privacy in the modern technological era.

A group of about 15 people from the Manhattan area attended the forum, including Manhattan Mayor Bruce Snead and Riley County Police Director Mike Watson.

Donna Schenck-Hamlin, ICDD associate and assistant to the Dean of KSU Libraries for Grants and Special Projects, acted as the facilitator for the discussion, beginning with a 20-minute clip from a recent teleconference on the federal Freedom of Information Act.

The clip showed three stories pulled from local news stations around the country. The first showed the story of a New Orleans reporter who, in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, requested government information on chemicals that might have leaked into the floodwaters. He wasn't provided the information until months later.

The second addressed a school district that refused to release information on the criminal records of district volunteers. The final clip was about the construction of a natural gas pipeline in a small Pennsylvania town. The pipeline's route was protected information during construction, causing residents to worry the pipeline would run through their yards. Following the clips, the discussion began.

Snead explained some of the difficulties citizens can face when trying to access government records.

"With a lot of government employees, they may know the specific information you want to know, but they won't tell you unless you ask for a specific document," he said.

Snead also talked about how some private documents can become public record.

"For instance, if I refer to a document in a City Commission meeting, it becomes public record," Snead said. "Even if no one else has seen it, it becomes accessible."

Watson commented on the extreme openness of public records in Florida.

"We have to be careful when sending information about investigations to Florida, because even things like active investigations are public record down there," Watson said. "If you were a drug dealer in Florida, you could go into the police station and find out if you were under investigation.

"The question becomes, 'What degree of gray do we want?' Because nobody wants it all one way or the other."

Jessica Boeckman, resident of Riley County, attended the forum with her 15-year-old son as part of his community involvement requirement for 4-H.

"We all want to know a little about our neighbors, whether they're dangerous, what secrets they're keeping, but we also want to protect ourselves and our information," Boeckman said. "We have to give up some privacy, but where do you draw the line?"

SENATE | 2 approved to fill vacant positions

event but was approved for $3,000. The group is conducting fundraisers to help pay for the event.

Senate approved an allocation of $1,000 to Navigators, a Christian campus ministry, to send 200 members to the University of Northern Iowa to attend a conference called Main Event Oct. 20-22.

Senate also introduced legislation for a $500 allocation to Sexual Health Awareness Peer Educators to send five members to Anaheim, Calif., Nov. 8-12 for a conference. There they will learn new methods for presenting sexual health information in the 35-40 presentations the group does throughout the year. The bill was held for referral.

The African Student Union requested an allocation from Senate to attend the Mid-American Association of African Students in St. Louis. The group requested $1,750 to present papers and take part in the conference, and the Allocations Committee recommended an allocation of $1,000. The bill was held for referral.

Senate welcomed two new members at the meeting to fill vacant seats. Krista Leben, sophomore in political science, was sworn in as a senator for the College of Arts and Sciences. Leben is from Loveland, Colo.

Kyle Spencer, junior in hotel and restaurant management, was sworn in as a senator for the College of Human Ecology. He is from Overland Park, Kan.

SMOKING BAN | Senate split on action taken time for the air to clear.

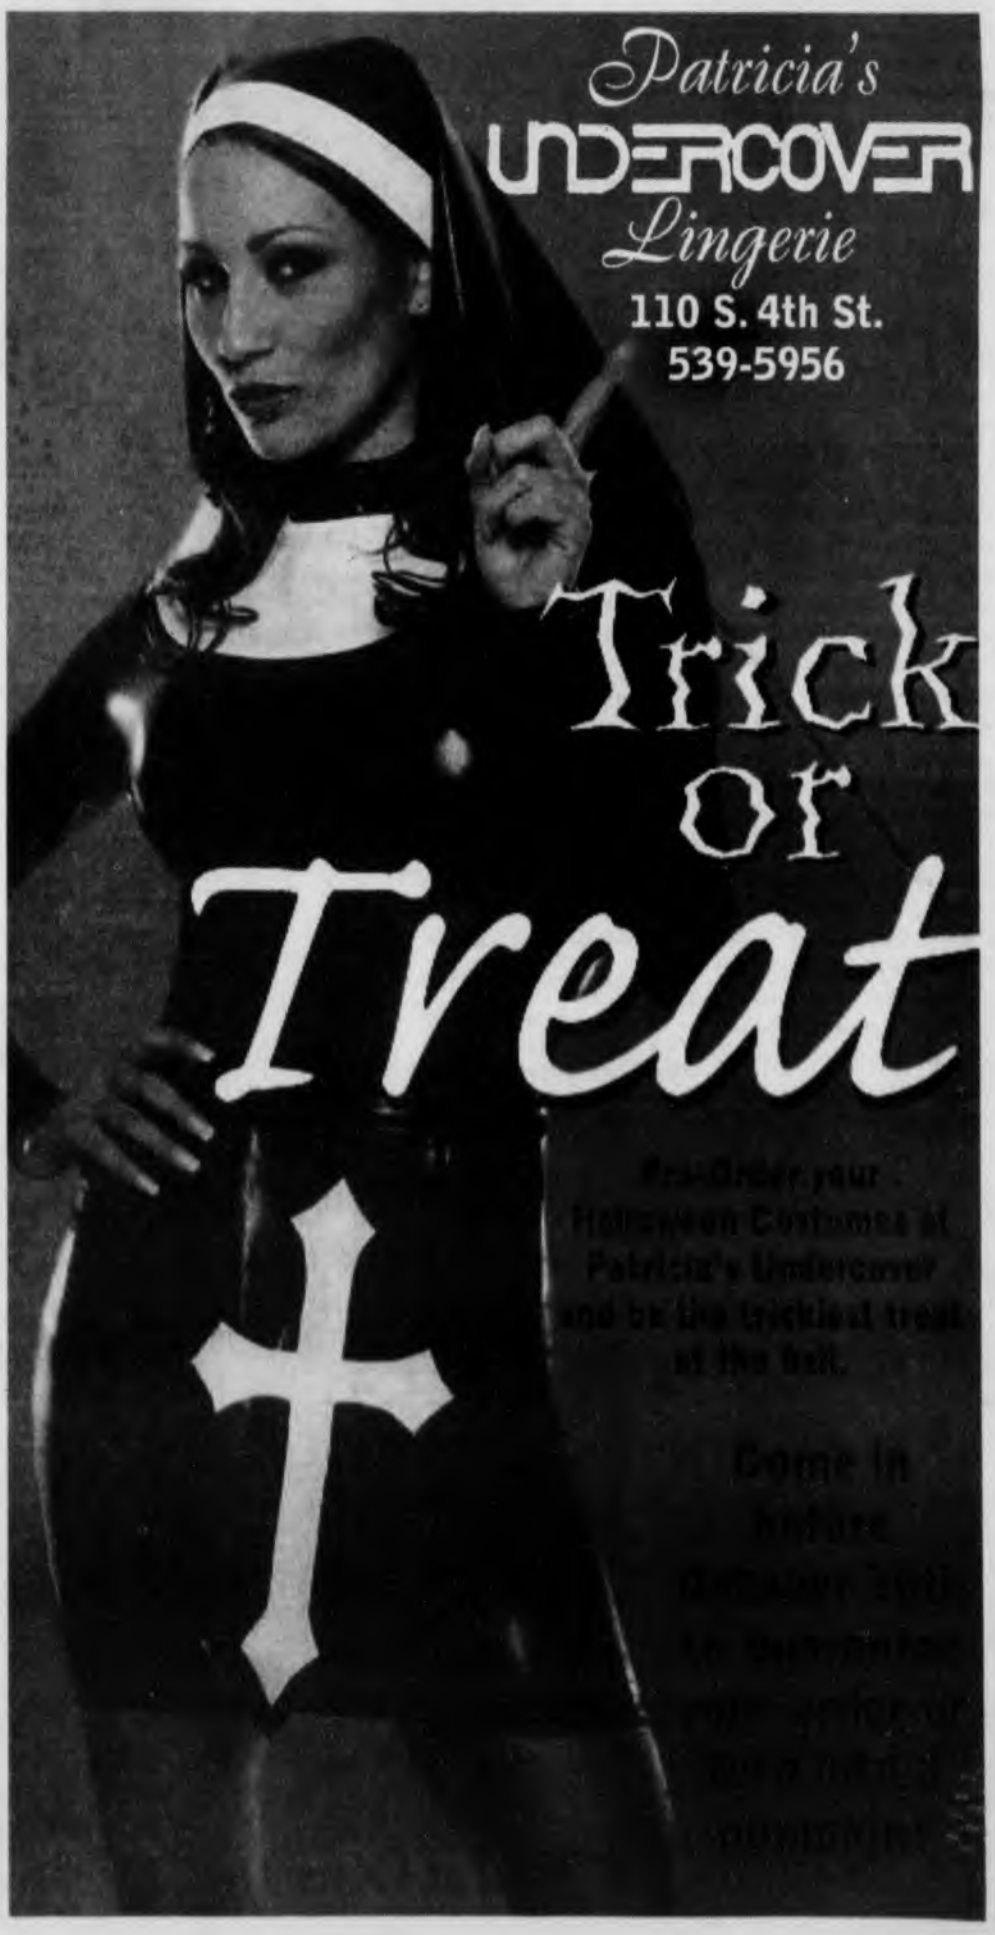
"I am pleased with the way it turned out. I personally would like the whole thing to be completely restricted. Most students are for a complete or partial ban, but you still have to respect that minority.

"I think we found a happy medium. The democratic process worked."



Tanner Banion, director of governmental relations, supports a complete ban.

"I am very disappointed with the three city commissioners who disregarded the health of their constituents for an asinine argument for property rights. If a property owner can claim that a municipality is infringing on his/her property rights in regards to the smoking ban, then why can a city zone a person's property for commercial or industrial?

"Commissioners disregarded overwhelming evidence and support for a complete ban. Enforcement will be a near impossibility."

Textbook feel of 'Destination Bride' makes it too much

"Destination Bride" by Lisa Light
Grade: C+
Reviewed by Emily Lawrence

"Destination Bride" is a good book for the couple that lacks a destination for their big day.

However, if they already know where they are going, they might want to look elsewhere.

This book is divided into two sections: the first quarter covers the process of considering and then planning a destination wedding.

The rest gives detailed coverage of locations across the country and the world. This book covers all the basics a bride and groom could need and possibly even more than they would want.

The size of the book is daunting.

The 383 pages of nine-point gray blocks of type are intimidating and almost too much for a wedding reference. There is an attempt to break up the gray with Tiffany's spot color and full-color photos, but the photos are run small and in the margins, adding to the textbook feel of this reference.

The first chapter is devoted to whether a destination wedding is suitable for the couple and is a good way to include those who are not yet on board with the idea.

However, I'm pretty sure anyone who just shelled out $24.99 for a book called "Destination Bride" already is committed to having a destination wedding.

Additionally, the couples who have committed to a wedding abroad more than likely have their destination chosen.

This couple would be better off purchasing a destination-specific title, because the majority of this book will be useless to them.

Author Lisa Light has written about, planned and coordinated some great weddings in her magazine work, but this book falls short of her talent.

I don't know if Light wanted this book to be a successful title or a large promotion for her Web site of the same name. The advertisement-filled site is likely more lucrative than this book ever could be.

Wants and needs

With so many companies offering registries, it's important to compare them and find the best fit for your big day. Below are a few registries offered by some larger nationwide chains.

Name	Accessibility	Return policy	Gift/Perks
Target Club Wed	Target offers kiosks at local stores and online ordering and purchasing. There are helpful customer service agents in stores, but lines are common. The Web site has several articles and planning tools.	Hold on to that gift receipt! You must have it to make any returns and exchanges. There is a 90-day post-wedding grace period for returns for store credit.	A welcome kit that includes a registry catalog, bridal-planning magazine, to-do checklists, shower ideas and more can be picked up at customer service. As a perk, you will receive 10 percent off everything on your registry that wasn't purchased for you as a gift.
Wal-Mart	There is an in-store kiosk and online ordering, but beware of your registry "rolling back." Items might be out of stock fast.	The return policy is the same as any regular store purchase at Wal-Mart.	None
JCPenney In partnership with Weddingsolutions.com.	JCPenney has an in-store kiosk and a helpful online site. One advantage to this store is the availability of higher-end products, and flatware and china registries.	A "friendly" return policy allows gifts to be returned without receipts, and online gifts can be returned in the store.	A useful wedding organizer and planner and access instructions for a free Web site can be picked up at Customer Service once 15 items have been added to the registry. The two offer a year-long 10-percent completion discount.

Take your time

Others' responses make wedding planning stressful, so relax before starting preparations

ALEX PEAK

Once the marriage proposal has taken place, the couple should try to take at least a month, if not longer, to relax before the hectic planning process begins.

Fortunately, I got engaged during the summer, when the most arduous task I had on my plate was showering and driving to summer school each day. If you have a year or more before the wedding, my advice is to not begin planning immediately. It might seem like a lot of fun to start hand-picking your wedding party and taste-testing cakes, but the more you relax while you still can, the better off you will be.

When you tell your close friends and family your engagement news, beware, as many of them will assume immediately they will be your maid of honor, bridesmaids, flower girls, ring bearers, groomsmen, etc. You and your spouse-to-be will instantly make friends you never knew you had.

Another qualm of getting engaged is receiving everyone's response. Hopefully, you'll get the pyramid effect: almost everyone will congratulate you (whether or not they really mean it), some won't really care either way, and a few will let you know you're too young, you haven't been dating long enough, or you two just aren't right for each other. We all know how to take compliments, but I cannot stress enough the importance of being prepared for those who are unenthusiastic about your marital choice. Negative attitudes will pop up, and you'll have to deal with them.

Once your engagement status is truly public, after you've called your relatives, and they've called their relatives, or you've had an engagement party or sent out engagement announcements, be prepared for everyone's opinion on how your wedding should be. You'll get more advice and more questions than you could imagine. People will want to know when the date is, where it will take place, what your colors will be, whether it will be a religious ceremony or not, what they need to wear, and what their role is in your wedding party.

Get ready. Your head will hurt. If you're not careful, you'll want to refuse calls, stop checking e-mail and never return another voicemail.

At this point, it's the beginning of the end. You can't go back; you can't revoke the engagement announcement from public knowledge. When things start to go crazy, this is a good time to call on close friends and family.

Hint: the people who stick by your side and stand up for you are good candidates for bridesmaids or groomsmen.

Although I'm still in the early stages, wedding planning is certainly an unparalleled experience. You will learn a lot of strange tidbits, like how your cousin's mom's brother was able to get a really good deal on wedding bands or how you can save money by checking out used wedding dresses.

This might be a stressful time, but try to relax and concentrate on yourself and your future spouse. You are planning one of the greatest days of your lives; make sure it is true to everything you guys are.

Asking status of relationship can embarrass, scare

CHRISTINA HANSEN

Someone always has to ask.

You've scarcely introduced your wedding date to relatives or family friends when you sense the question so eagerly perched at the tip of their tongues.

"So, when are you two getting married?"

Whether you and your significant other have been together for two weeks or two years – it's inevitable. Maybe it's the repetition of those sacred marriage vows, or perhaps the sight of a happy couple joining hands in front of an altar, but something emboldens even perfect strangers to ask young couples this highly personal question.

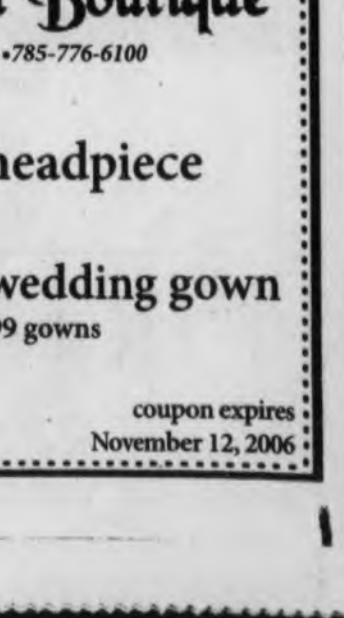
Besides being rude and more than a little bit nosy, this loaded inquiry also carries the potential to offend, embarrass or completely scare off your date. A young man or woman might nervously stammer one of three responses as his or her date looks on – all of them problematic.

Response #1: "Who – her? Oh, we're not getting married." Did the room just get a little colder? Maybe it's just the glass of ice water your girlfriend doused you with on her way out the door.

Response #2: "As soon as this guy gets around to proposing." If his looks could kill, you would be dead. You've just laid all responsibility for your lack of upcoming nuptials squarely on your boyfriend's shoulders.

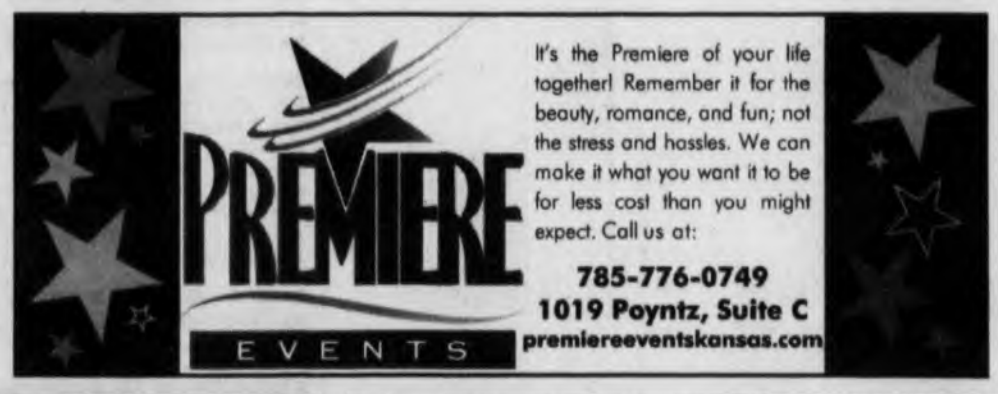
Response #3: "Well, uh ... we haven't really discussed that yet." More than a little weak, this cop-out makes you vulnerable to a slew of follow-up questions.

I chose some variation of Response #3 the last time my boyfriend and I encountered this question, but I am beginning to wonder why I feel the obligation to answer at all.



Wedding or no wedding, the status of two people's relationship should be their personal business. You wouldn't ask a couple if they were considering divorce, so why is it okay to ask if they're considering marriage?

This type of question causes undue embarrassment to couples who are just beginning to get to know each other and puts undue pressure on those in long-term relationships. Wedding inquiries should only be made of a couple wearing rings on the appropriate fingers and smiles on their faces.



As long as well-meaning guests continue to pose the question, however, the best way to answer is with a sense of humor. Mention words and phrases like "Las Vegas," "elope" and "next week" in any combination or assure your fellow guests they'll be the first to know if there is any news.

A little bit of laughter will set your date at ease, and your light-hearted sarcasm should quickly silence the inquiring party without violating your privacy.

WIC | Proposed changes align packages with dietary guidelines, increase variety to suit diverse clientele

Dietary Guidelines.

While nutritionists seem to like this change, the dairy and egg industries announced some concern.

"The proposed rule limits options for milk substitution within the dairy group, which may make it difficult for women and children to correct some nutrient deficiencies," said Kim Polzin, vice president of consumer communications of Midwest Dairy Council.

She said, according to the 2005 Dietary Guidelines Advisory Committee Report, the dairy group is a key contributor of dietary calcium and a substantial contributor of vitamin A, potassium and magnesium.

"For children, USDA acknowledges that dairy is a superior nutrient source for bone health," Polzin said.

Yet Kellum thinks six gallons of milk are too much for her.

"And most people don't even drink as much milk and don't eat much cheese, either," she said.

Polzin said both the Dietary Guidelines and the WIC program still recognize the importance of dairy foods in healthy diets. The proposed changes will make the WIC packages for clients age 2 years and older more consistent with the dietary guidelines for Americans by "including foods from each basic food group and allowing some variety and choice within food groups, as well as providing fruits and vegetables and therefore promoting the consumption of whole fruits and vegetables," KDHE specialist Heideman said.

Polzin said the proposed WIC food packages "emphasize food groups to be encouraged for a healthy diet, including three daily servings of dairy foods for most women in the program and two daily servings for children under age 5, plus adding more fruits, vegetables and whole grains."

The proposal will reduce saturated fat, cholesterol, total fat, and, in some food packages, calories.

Nutritionists like Sandra B. Procter, coordinator in the Department of Human Nutrition, know there is some concern on the side of the traditional WIC packaging, but the rules for milk and alternatives are still within the recommended guidelines for children. Procter said research has shown the level, which would be provided through the new packages, still would be adequate for children's well-being.

"It is necessary that, in order to stay within the same cost as always, the WIC food package will allow less in some areas or food groups in order to increase allowances in others – namely, the fruit and vegetable groups and in whole grains, particularly," Procter said.

Heideman added that the features of the proposed changes will make the packages appeal to a diverse population of WIC clients.

Further, there will be changes in the possibility of substituting milk with tofu and soy-products. The new rules decrease the amount of cheese allowed for substitution of milk and, on the other hand, allow a WIC receiver to substitute tofu or fortified soy-based beverages for milk.

Polzin said the 2005 Dietary Guidelines state that milk alternatives within the dairy food group, like yogurt and lactose-free milk, are the easiest and most reliable way for those sensitive to lactose to get the health benefits associated with milk and milk products. However, Heideman sees a good option in the proposed changes to allow soy-based beverages and tofu.

"This change provides the WIC Program more flexibility to meet the cultural needs of WIC clients and allows a greater variety and choice for WIC clients," he said.

Polzin is concerned that tofu cannot adequately replace all the dairy nutrients.

"Availability of a variety of dairy options, such as yogurt and cheese, would more fully bring the WIC package into agreement with the Dietary Guidelines, while also responding to calls for foods that meet cultural preferences," she said.

Nutritionists have been looking and hoping for the proposed changes for a long time.

"This is a much-needed, long-awaited opportunity for some very positive changes to be made in the diets of a very vulnerable part of our population," Procter said.

She said the suggested changes are quite reasonable, because the way people ate in the 1970s is different from how they eat today. When the WIC packages started in 1974, there was an emphasis on juice and milk rather than on real fruits and vegetables, but this is not a helpful balance for children, according to latest research.

Further, nutrition research has identified several ways Americans can improve their food choices since the 1970s, so WIC food guidelines needed to be updated.

"It seems only right that we allow everyone access to those healthier choices," Procter said. She thinks food packages needed to include fresh fruits because they, as well as whole grains, provide more benefits for children.

Heideman agrees.

"The proposed changes make the WIC food packages more consistent with the 2005 Dietary Guidelines for Americans by reducing the fat, especially saturated fat content of the food packages while increasing whole grains and adding fruits and vegetables," he said.

Procter suggested thinking about what people learned about health and food within the last 30 years.

"The National Dairy Council and the Midwest Dairy Council have a long history of working collaboratively with state and local WIC programs to conduct nutrition education," Polzin said. "We look forward to continuing this effort."

Each month about 8 million participants are provided for by WIC. This created federal food costs of $3.6 billion in Fiscal Year 2005. Children are the largest category of WIC participants. To be eligible for WIC, one has to meet certain categorical, residential and income requirements, and be at a nutritional risk. To apply, contact the WIC State or a local agency serving and schedule an appointment to determine eligibility. The program is available in all 50 states.

In addition to the food packages, WIC offers nutrition education and referrals to health and other social services to participants at no charge.

Kellum will start a breastfeeding basics class offered by WIC this Saturday and hopes to be prepared to give birth and take care of her baby. More information about WIC can be found on its Web site www.fns.usda.gov/wic.

The Killers' sophomore album 'Sam's Town' undergoes changes, but familiar, signature sounds unify tracks

"Sam's Town"

Grade: B+

Album review by Adrianne DeWeese

Sometimes a band's successful debut album is hard to follow.

Let's thank the musical gods that The Killers are an exception.

"Sam's Town" is the The Killers' follow-up to 2004's "Hot Fuss," which sold five million copies worldwide. The alternative-synth rock quartet appeared on the season premiere of "Saturday Night Live" on Saturday, and performed on "Jimmy Kimmel Live" Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday nights.

The album already has peaked at number one at the iTunes online music store.

Brandon Flowers, lead singer and keyboardist, is confident in the band's latest effort. He was quoted in the October edition of Giant magazine as saying "Sam's Town" will be "one of the best albums in the past 20 years."

The album's title comes from Sam's Town Hotel and Gambling Hall, a hotel and casino in the band's hometown of Las Vegas. The title track, which opens the album, has lyrics that give a casino-feel: "You know I see London/I see Sam's Town/Holds my hand and/Lets my hair down."

Flowers has undergone a makeover since "Hot Fuss" by trading in his baby-faced, eyeliner image for a mustache and darker clothing. Think a little less 1980s glam-pop, and little more Old-West-meets-Vegas.

But even with an image change, there are familiar and signature sounds of "Hot Fuss" echoed throughout the new album – the title track, "Read My Mind" and "Bones" all open with synth sounds, and Flowers' falsetto is all over the album.

The album's first single, "When You Were Young," is by far its best track. It tells the story in three-and-a-half minutes of a young girl who has chosen a suitor who causes her to reflect on her past: "He doesn't look a thing like Jesus/But he talks like a gentleman/Like you imagined when you were young."

The album's second single, "Bones," will be released later this year. Its video was directed by Tim Burton.

"Enterlude" and "Exitlude" are short, simple piano songs with lyrics that link the beginning of the album to the end: "We hope you enjoy your stay/It's good to have you with us/Even if it's just for the day."

"Read My Mind" has a reoccurring theme that is woven together by – what else? – Flowers asking if the song's subject can read his mind: "I don't mind if you don't mind/'Cause I don't shine if you don't shine/Before you go/Can you read my mind?"

While it might not be one of the best albums of the last 20 years, as Flowers claims, The Killers certainly have echoed the success of its debut album in "Sam's Town." A fresh image is a bonus to the album's content, and old fans and new listeners alike will be left satisfied.

Off the Field with Jeff Snodgrass

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jeff Snodgrass is not a normal kicker. He likes to get into the game and tackle just like the other players on the team. Snodgrass is 8-of-12 on field goals this year and a perfect 8-of-8 on extra points. Last year, the 6-foot, 200 pound senior kicked a 57-yard field goal against North Texas, which was the longest by any K-State kicker since 1999. He recently took some time after practice to answer questions on his atypical kicker attitude, his music preferences before a game and his future plans.

Q. Did you ever have any people make fun of your name or come up with some interesting nicknames?
A. I have got a bunch. You have snod-ass, booger-wheat, snot-turf and anything you can turn into grass or snot.

Q. You played with Marcus Perry in high school. Was he as crazy then as he is now on the field?
A. I would say more. He is coming out of his shell now. He was crazy in high school, but he is still pretty crazy now.

Q. Your older brother played Major League Soccer. Did he influence you with your kicking interest or abilities?
A. Not really. We had always grown up playing soccer. His love ended up being soccer, and mine ended up being football. I go out and kick the soccer ball with my brother every once and a while. We are two different types of athletes.

Q. You said you want to go to law school. Where do you plan on going?
A. My dream school would be Northwestern in Chicago. Right now, I am probably going to go to either UMKC or KU.

Q. Many people believe kickers are not at the same level as the other position players. Do you see that at K-State?
A. We do not really have that issue here. Mainly because Jared Parker and I like to hit people. People always make fun, saying that I am one of the biggest kickers out there, but that is what the weight room is for. I always wanted to not be known as a kicker.

Q. Why did you get involved in the on-field scuffles at the Marshall games over the past few years?
A. That is the great thing about football. It seems like it is the only place that any male that has any true male tendencies and likes to be aggressive can actually do anything about it. That was one of the situations. I was pissed when they jumped on our cat head. I love this program, and I see myself as a linebacker, lineman or anybody else when someone screws with my school or team.

Q. Do you like to listen to any music before the games to get you ready?
A. I usually listen to music. I always tell the coaches the day that I am not goofing around and not carefree – that's the day you got to worry about, so I try to listen to music. I don't listen to all that head-banging nonsense. I usually listen to some easy-going music like country or whatever is in my car.

OFFENSE

K-State's offense has struggled recently, scoring only nine points in its last two games. The Wildcats rank 88th in the nation in total offense and 82nd in scoring offense at 20.2 points per game. K-State has combined to throw five interceptions since its last touchdown pass, three games ago against Marshall.

Oklahoma State has been scoring an average of 40 points per game. However, three of its four games have been against Missouri State, Arkansas State, and Florida Atlantic. The Cowboys' offensive attack has remained balanced, averaging more than 200 yards through the air and on the ground.

DEFENSE

The Wildcat defense will try to build on the solid start they have had this year. This week they will need to shut down Oklahoma State's dual-threat quarterback, Bobby Reid. He is averaging nearly 200 yards passing and about 40 yards rushing a game. Defensive end Ian Campbell — who leads K-State in sacks with 5.5 — will need to have a big day.

Oklahoma State has held opponents to an average of 14.8 points per game. However, in a 34-25 loss at Houston in their last game, the Cowboys gave up 509 yards of total offense. The Cougars found a weakness in the Cowboy secondary, completing 21-of-28 passes for 313 yards. Opponents have converted seven of eight red zone opportunities against Oklahoma State.

SPECIAL TEAMS

The Wildcats scored three special teams touchdowns in their first two games, but lately have been less productive. Last week it was K-State's punt return team getting flagged several times for blocks in the back. Punter Tim Reyer had a good game against Baylor, pinning the Bears inside the 20-yard line twice. Reyer is averaging 40.5 yards per punt this season.

Overall, Oklahoma State's special teams unit has been solid this year. Punter Matt Fodge is averaging 52.3 yards per punt, including two punts of at least 70 yards. Kicker Jason Ricks also has proven range, converting a 53-yard field goal.

The Cowboys rank first in the Big 12 in kickoff coverage, and second in kickoff and punt returns.

PREDICTION

Coming off a bye week, Oklahoma State should be well-rested when they arrive in Manhattan. The Cowboys are averaging a touchdown every 12 plays. If K-State can't stop the big play, this game could be over early. The hope is that Freeman and the other new starters will spark an offensive unit that has had trouble capitalizing on scoring opportunities. The K-State defense and special teams won't be able to come up with enough big plays to keep the game close.

Cowboy offense poses threat

By Cedrique Flemming
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Don't expect a defensive slugfest Saturday.

The Oklahoma State Cowboys come into Snyder Family Stadium sporting the No. 7 scoring offense in the country, averaging 40 points per game.

They also have the 15th-best rush offense (203 yards per game) and 24th-best total offense (414.8 yards). The Wildcats only average 103.4 yards rushing and 299.2 total yards while scoring an average of 20.2 points per game.

K-State football coach Ron Prince said his team will have its hands full with all of the weapons the Cowboys (3-1 overall, 0-0 Big 12 Conference) possess.

"I can see very clearly why, offensively, they are either at the top or near the top, particularly in the passing game," Prince said.

Mike Hamilton is the starting running back for the Cowboys. He averages more than six yards per carry, and he has 319 yards rushing this season with three touchdowns.

Hamilton's yards are important to Oklahoma State's offense, but Prince said sophomore quarterback Bobby Reid is who makes the Cowboys tick.

"They have a terrific quarterback," Prince said. "When you look at the individual passers within the (Big 12), he has a very impressive résumé."

Reid's résumé includes four games in which he has thrown for nearly 800 yards, 10 touchdowns and just three interceptions. His passing efficiency, 185.1, is third in the nation.

He also can make big plays on the ground. In the Cowboys' last game against Houston, Reid ran for a career-high 85 yards and was the leading rusher in the 34-25 loss to the Cougars. He averages 36.8 yards rushing per game and has two rushing touchdowns on the season.

"He presents some obvious issues," defensive end Ian Campbell said. "It's not issues you don't already face throughout the Big 12, though. You just gotta know your responsibilities, and you have to play smart."

Prince said the Cowboys' two wide receivers also will pose big-play threats.

Junior Adarius Bowman ranks ninth nationally with his 96 yards receiving per game. He averages 25.6 yards per reception – the country's best average. He has touchdown receptions of 69 and 55 yards this season. His 75-yard touchdown against Houston was the second-longest pass play in the Big 12 this season.

Senior D'Juan Woods has a 72-yard touchdown reception of his own and is stamping his name in Cowboy record books. He ranks third on the Cowboy career receiving yards list with 2,271 and third in receptions with 130. Older brother Rashaun, who plays for the San Diego Chargers, tops both lists.

Even with the numerous threats posed by the Cowboys, the Wildcat defense isn't changing its preparation strategies.

"The defense is preparing the same way we always have," linebacker Brandon Archer said. "We are not too worried about the big-play capacity. Hopefully we can just play our game and come away with the win."

Oklahoma State quarterback Bobby Reid's pass efficiency rating of 185.1 is the third highest in the nation.

5 Keys to Victory

3rd-down conversions, long throws essential

By Austin Meek
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

1. STRETCH THE FIELD

Dylan Meier's inability to make throws down the field has allowed opposing defenses to stack eight or nine defenders in the box and shut down K-State's running game.

If Josh Freeman can complete a long pass or two, it will loosen up the Oklahoma State defense and create holes for fellow true freshman Leon Patton.

2. DECREASE THE PENALTIES

The Wildcats have the second-highest number of penalties in the Big 12 Conference, averaging more than seven per game. Against Baylor, K-State was penalized 84 yards and rushed for just 45 yards, the third time this season the Wildcats have finished a game with more penalty yards than rushing yards.

3. FIND CONTINUITY ON OFFENSIVE LINE

4. CONVERT THIRD DOWNS

K-State converted just five of 13 third-down opportunities against Baylor and ranks 11th in the conference in third-down conversion percentage. The Wildcat offense must find a way to stay on the field and sustain drives.

5. LIMIT BIG PLAYS

Adarius Bowman has catches of 75, 69 and 55 yards this season for the Cowboys. K-State doesn't have the firepower to win a shootout, so the Wildcats must contain Oklahoma State's quick-strike offense.

A 'fresh' start?

K-State will start 3 true freshmen on offense Saturday in its conference home opener

By Nick Dunn
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When Josh Freeman makes his first career start Saturday against Oklahoma State, he'll have someone right behind him doing the same thing. In almost a more surprising move than the quarterback switch, true freshman Leon Patton unseated senior Thomas Clayton earlier this week for the starting tailback position.

Starting two true freshmen in the same backfield is rare in college football, but Patton said he and Freeman haven't thought much about it.

"We'll just go out there like any other players," Patton said. "This is the next level. You can't think about that stuff. If they put you out there, you've got to be able to do it."

Reaching the midpoint of the season, coach Ron Prince already has displayed a remarkable amount of confidence in his younger players, giving a number of true freshmen significant playing time.

"One of the things that we tell them is that when they're ready, we're ready," Prince said. "I make those kinds of assessments from practice and then from how they contribute to the kicking game."

So far this season, four true freshmen have seen a large amount of action: tight end Jeron Mastrud, cornerback Josh Moore, Freeman and Patton. Compare that to last year, when only Reggie Walker saw playing time as a true freshman. In 2003, Jermaine Moreira was the only true freshman to get game action.

On Saturday, the only true freshman to start for Oklahoma State will be linebacker Chris Collins.

Traditionally, the jump straight from high school to Division-I college football is too much for a young person to handle, causing the majority of them to red-shirt their first season. In fact, of the 54 older players on K-State's roster who were here as freshmen, 50 of them red-shirted.

Mastrud earned his first start earlier this season against Louisville when Rashaad Norwood was suspended for one game. He said the adjustment from high school has been hard but not unbearable.

"It's kind of like when I stepped up from freshmen football to varsity in high school," he said. "Some of the older players have brought me up to where I needed to be, because I got my ass kicked in the beginning of two-a-days."

With so many younger players taking over for players three or four years older, it could be a cause for concern in the team's unity, but defensive end Ian Campbell said that is not the case.

"There's no tension like that," he said. "We're all out there just trying to get it done. Nobody's really worried about his position. It's not showing, anyways. It's just trying to get the team better."

Even though the true freshmen are some of the only players Prince is responsible for recruiting, Prince denied he is looking to the future by rushing them into starting roles.

Every player is obviously talented. Patton has run a 10.18-second 100-meter dash, and Freeman has the ability to put the ball almost anywhere he wants, Prince said.

"We're not trying to send a message to anybody," he said. "It's just a matter of performance. The only future I'm looking forward to is this game. I don't want to live in the past. I'm just worried about getting the team to play as well as it can play."

Catrina Rawson| COLLEGIAN

Freshman Jeron Mastrud is listed along with junior Rashaad Norwood as the starting tight ends for Saturday's game. In five games, Mastrud has caught six passes for 59 yards.

K-State faces must-win game against Cowboys

Coach Ron Prince walked out of the visitor's locker room of Floyd Casey Stadium. Reporters gathered on the stadium's concourse and quickly crowded around the first-year coach. The recorders were out. The television cameras were on.

JONATHAN GARTEN

It had been a long night for Prince's Wildcats. The offense turned over the ball five times. The defense looked average against a struggling offense.

K-State's best player in the game arguably was punter Tim Reyer. He pinned the Bears deep inside their own territory twice and made a touchdown-saving tackle on one of Baylor's returns. Reyer punted 10 times, giving him plenty of time to find his rhythm.

As Prince and players addressed members of the media, it was easy to see the team was approaching a crossroad. For the first time of the year, it faces a must-win game.

After Oklahoma State, the games won't get any easier. Wins against Nebraska, Missouri and Texas aren't likely.

At Tuesday's weekly press conference, not many players felt like talking about K-State's 17-3 loss to Baylor. A total of three – Ian Campbell, Rob Jackson and Michael Pooschke – out of 28 players requested showed up to the interview. Later that night, after practice ran an hour longer than usual, seven more players were available for comment.

Coaches are desperate for results. Players are ducking the media. A loss to Oklahoma State this Saturday would end all hopes of a bowl game.

Prince's answer to an offense that has scored nine points in the last two games is to start a pair of true freshmen – Josh Freeman and Leon Patton – in the backfield.

It's a bold move when you consider how unreliable Freeman has been this year. Sometimes he hasn't recognized blitzes. He constantly stares down his receivers. And he's made a bad habit of chucking the ball into triple coverage.

But there is still something special about the 18-year-old. He won't be accused of having a lack of confidence. He towers over everyone on the field at 6-feet-6-inches tall. And his arm strength is reminiscent of quarterbacks named Bishop, Beasley and Roberson.

Changes have been made along the offensive line as well. Redshirt freshman Brock Unruh, who was buried on the depth chart earlier this year, will become the third new starter for the Wildcats at right guard. True freshman Trevor Viers was moved from backup defensive end to second-string right tackle.

The attitude from here on out seems to be "let the freshmen play, and if it doesn't work out, then at least they have some experience." Currently there are 10 freshmen on K-State's depth chart who are either starting or second-string.

Don't expect to see Dylan Meier or Thomas Clayton get their jobs back. Going back on that decision wouldn't be smart at this point. There's no turning back from here.

No. 1 choice

True freshman Josh Freeman takes over at quarterback for struggling Dylan Meier

By Jeffrey Rake
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When true freshman quarterback Josh Freeman was told after last Saturday's loss to Baylor he would be the starter for the "foreseeable future," he was unsure whether it was true.

That is because he found out from the media, rather than from coach Ron Prince.

"It was a little awkward. Normally a coach will sit you down," Freeman said.

"Learning it from the media, I was a little bit puzzled, wondering if it was true or not."

Freeman received official word from the coaching staff the next day, when coaches told Freeman he would replace senior quarterback Dylan Meier.

"I came in to watch film, and they said they were behind me 100 percent," he said.

"I got a little nervous, but that died down. I've started to prepare the best I can."

The quarterback switch comes at a time when the Wildcats' offense has struggled, scoring just nine points in the last two games with Meier as the starter.

Meier has completed 69 of 136 passes on the season and has fewer touchdowns (three) than interceptions (four).

"It's not the way I had it planned; it's not the way I would have scripted it to go," Prince said of the quarterback situation.

"If you don't have jitters before a game, the game obviously doesn't mean anything to you. I'm excited about the opportunity to show what I can do."

Josh Freeman
QUARTERBACK

Prince said Meier's inability to throw the ball with accuracy down the field has handicapped the Wildcats' offense at times.

Opposing defenses have not been forced to respect the passing game and have been able to focus on stopping the run.

Prince said he is hopeful that Freeman's arm strength will help the offense establish a vertical attack it's been lacking so far this season.

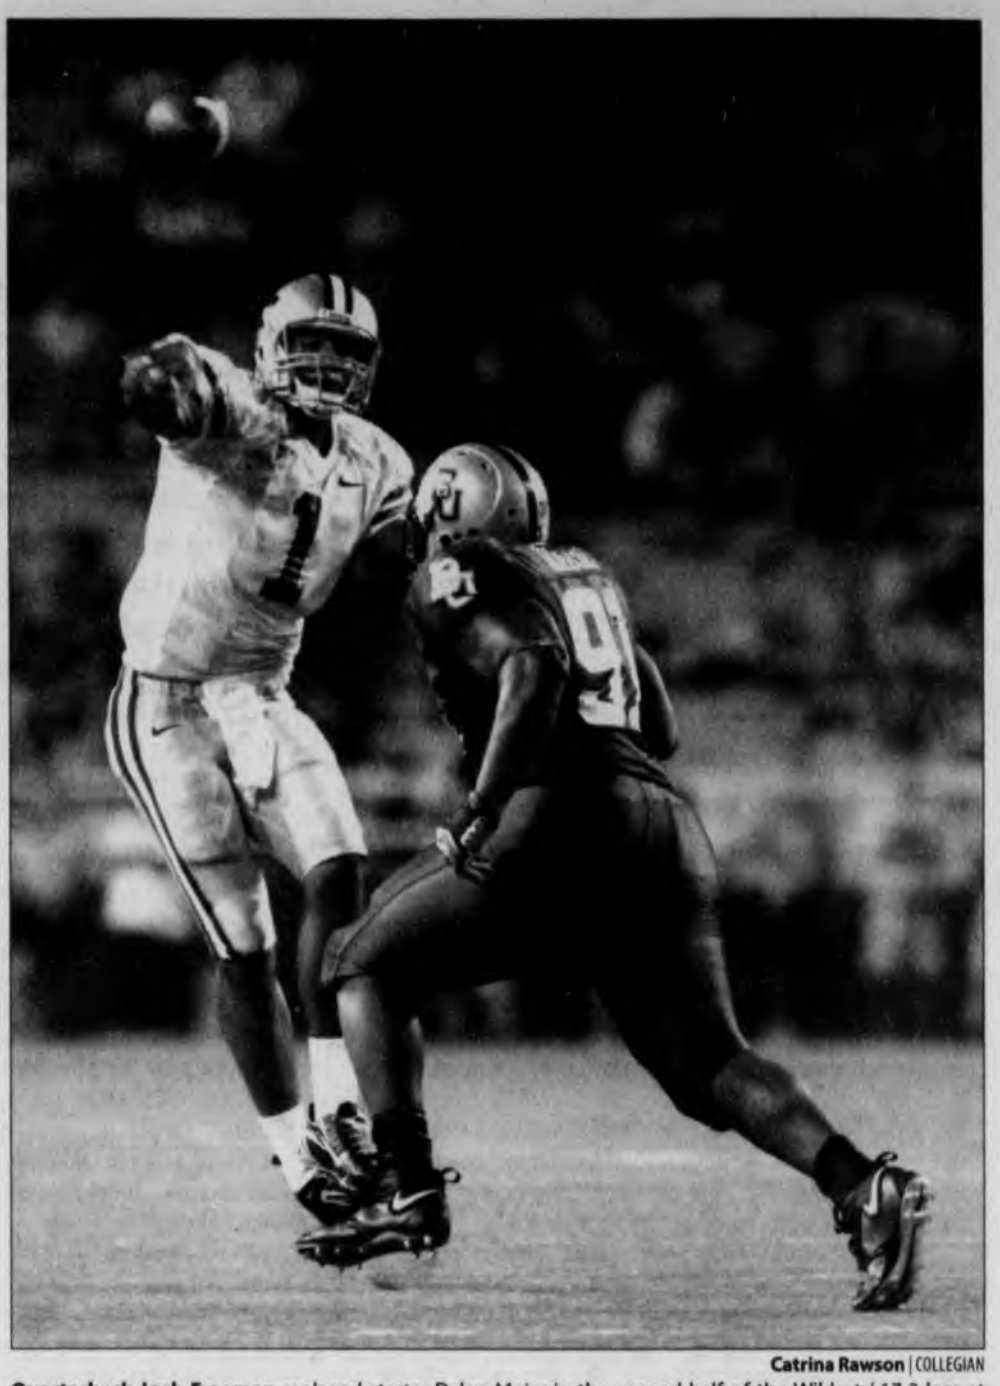
"Defenses want to come in and stop the run first, and if they do that, we have to be able to get the ball to our play-makers on the outside," Prince said, "and that's really what this is about: our ability to be able to deal with one-on-one coverage on the outside and to have a legitimate chance to put the ball in a number of places on the field plays a factor in that."

In the second half, Freeman demonstrated the ability to throw the ball deep against Baylor, completing passes of 55 yards and 68 yards.

He said he believes Prince will give him the opportunity to prove his ability and won't coddle him.

"He didn't put me in the driver's seat so that he could throttle it off," Freeman said. "He's trying to loosen it up."

Though Prince might try to loosen up the offense, he certainly does not want to do so at the expense of turning over the ball.



Freeman threw three interceptions in the second half of the Baylor game, including one in the end zone.

"It's just a matter of doing smart things with the football," Freeman said.

Freeman said since the announcement was made that he would start, he has received an overwhelming amount of support from his teammates.

Many of them are confident in his ability and trust Prince's judgment, saying the decision wouldn't have been made if Prince didn't believe Freeman could handle the job.

"I agree with whatever it takes to win the ball game," senior linebacker Brandon Archer said. "Ultimately, if he helps us out, then it's the right move."

Catrina Rawson | COLLEGIAN
Quarterback Josh Freeman replaced starter Dylan Meier in the second half of the Wildcats' 17-3 loss at Baylor. Freeman completed 11-of-33 passes for 196 yards and three interceptions.

Despite losing the starting job, Freeman said Meier has been a great teammate and has demonstrated strong senior leadership.

"He is taking it in stride," Freeman said. "He's just supporting me, trying to teach me dimensions of the game that I don't completely understand."

One area Freeman will be forced to understand by this weekend is the pressures of being the starting quarterback, especially now that the Wildcats are at a critical point in the season.

The Wildcats are 3-2 overall and will try to avoid an 0-2 start to conference play when they play Oklahoma State Saturday at Snyder Family Stadium.

"If you don't have jitters before a game, the game obviously doesn't mean anything to you," he said. "I'm excited about the opportunity to show what I can do."

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

OSU shows improvement in Gundy's second year

By Austin Meek
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Oklahoma State coach Mike Gundy knows the story of the rookie head coach and the team struggling to find its identity. A year ago, it was his.

When the Cowboys visit Snyder Family Stadium on Saturday, Gundy will be across the field from the 2006 edition, featuring Ron Prince and the K-State Wildcats.

The Cowboys finished 4-7 in Gundy's first season, but they have shown marked improvement through four games this year. Earlier this week, Gundy spoke about the challenges of implementing a new system and the improvements he's seen in his second season.

"No matter what you do on offense, whether you're a two-back team or a spread, I think the most important thing is that you understand your philosophy, and you take care of the football," Gundy said.

"I think the difference for our offense this year is we're running the ball better, we have better quarterback play with Bobby (Reid), and we're taking care of the football for the most part."

Reid, who completed just 48 percent of his passes a year ago, leads the Big 12 Conference in passing efficiency this season. The sophomore from Houston also has rushed for 147 yards.

Reid's favorite target has been wide receiver Adarius Bowman, a North Carolina transfer who leads the Cowboys with 15 catches. Bowman averages 25.6 yards per reception, tops in the nation.

D'Juan Woods, the Cowboys' leading receiver from a year ago, has eight catches this season.

"The receivers (the Cowboys) have are pretty good," K-State freshman cornerback Josh Moore said. "It makes me more excited knowing that they're going to come at me."

Oklahoma State's rushing attack ranks third in the Big 12, led by running back Mike Hamilton. Dantrell Savage, a junior-college transfer who Prince calls the Cowboys' "secret weapon," enters the game averaging nearly 10 yards per carry.

The Cowboy offensive line is anchored by right tackle Corey Hilliard, who Prince compared to Leonard Davis of the Arizona Cardinals.

"They have a right tackle that I think will be a major factor in the game," Prince said. "I think he is a very elite player. He's a guy who can run-block with power and dominate the edge."

"No matter what you do on offense, whether you're a two-back team or a spread, I think the most important thing is that you understand your philosophy, and you take care of the football."

Mike Gundy
OSU COACH

The Cowboys struggled on defense a year ago, allowing more than 30 points and 400 yards of offense per game. The Cowboys gave up 509 yards of offense in a 34-25 loss to Houston earlier this season, but Prince said the Oklahoma State defense should not be taken lightly.

"Defensively, they play a number of players. They have tremendous depth," Prince said. "All of their players at a particular position are the same. They're strong, they're fast and they have terrific builds. I think they're very, very talented."

Big 12 Conference update

Texas, Oklahoma highlight schedule of games on Saturday

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State grabbed headlines this week with the move to start true freshman Josh Freeman at quarterback. But there are other things happening outside Manhattan this weekend that will affect the balance of the Big 12 Conference.

Big 12 schedule in full swing

NO. 7 TEXAS VS. NO. 13 OKLAHOMA

This is the 100th installment of the Red River Shootout. Although Oklahoma has won five out of the past six meetings – last year the Longhorns beat the Sooners soundly 45-12 – Vince Young has since moved on to the NFL, and both teams enter the game with one loss on the year. Longhorn quarterback Colt McCoy has exceeded expectations so far with an incredible 207.99 quarterback rating, completing 82.6 percent of his passes in the past three games. Oklahoma Heisman candidate Adrian Peterson enters the game second in the nation in all-purpose yards with 195.8 per game. While Texas was beating up on Sam Houston State last week, Oklahoma rested and prepared for one of the biggest rivalries in college football.

NO. 22 NEBRASKA AT IOWA STATE

Last year, the Huskers pulled off an overtime victory against the Cyclones in Lincoln. This year, both teams hope to establish themselves at the top of the Big 12 North. The game this year should be a shootout, as Nebraska is first in the conference in scoring offense, and Iowa State is last in scoring defense. The Huskers' defense has not been solid either, giving up 405 passing yards to Kansas backup quarterback Adam Barmann. Both teams are looking to bounce back from last week's narow wins at home against Kansas and Northern Iowa, respectively.

NO. 25 MISSOURI AT TEXAS TECH

In the last meeting between the two teams, they produced 93 total points, Missouri emerging with the 31-point win. This year should be another high scoring game. Missouri is ranked 10th nationally in total offense, and Texas Tech is ranked 15th. Both average more than 33 points a game. The teams also have the conference's two most productive quarterbacks in Graham Harrell and Chase Daniel.

Injury Update

BARMANN RETURNS THE JOB

Redshirt-freshman quarterback Kerry Meier has been named the starter by Kansas coach Mark Mangino. Although backup Adam Barmann passed for more than 700 yards in the past two games, Mangino said Meier is still the starter when he becomes healthy, and there is not a quarterback controversy.

Interesting Stats

BOWEN TACKLES THE COMPETITION

Iowa State linebacker Alvin Bowen is leading the nation in tackles with 13.8 tackles per game. Tyrone McKenzie, also an Iowa State linebacker, is sixth in the nation in tackles, averaging 11.2 per game.

TEXAS A&M SPREADS THE WEALTH

Although the Aggies lead the Big 12 in rushing, no one on the team is in the Top 12 individual rushers. Jorvorskie Lane, who leads the team with 60.2 yards per game, also leads the conference with 11 rushing touchdowns, which ties him with Rutgers' Ray Rice for the most in the nation.

Wildcats need at least 3 more wins for post-season eligibility

I'll admit it: following K-State's 17-3 loss at Baylor, I felt disheartened.

WENDY HAUN

I want to see K-State qualify for a bowl game before I graduate. I was hoping it would happen this year, but now I'm not so sure.

However, looking at the schedule, here's what K-State has to do to ensure they qualify for the post-season.

OKLAHOMA STATE

The Cowboys' Bobby Reid ranks first in the Big 12 in passing efficiency with 10 touchdowns and only three interceptions. However, the Cowboys rank eighth in the conference in red-zone offense, scoring on 14 of 18 trips inside the 20-yard line. By stopping Reid from making big plays, K-State could come away with a win.

K-State 24, Oklahoma State 21

NEBRASKA

Nebraska ranks first in the Big 12 in both scoring offense and total offense. K-State ranks third in the conference in total defense with 280.2 yards and eight touchdowns allowed. This game will be a battle of K-State's defense against the Nebraska offense.

K-State 17, Nebraska 28

MISSOURI

The surprise of the Big 12 North this year is unbeaten Missouri. Missouri ranks first in the Big 12 in both scoring defense and total defense. Offensively, Missouri ranks seventh in the Big 12 in scoring offense. The true battle of the defenses could go either way, depending on how K-State's Josh Freeman shapes out.

K-State 24, Missouri 21

IOWA STATE

Iowa State might be one of the easier opponents down the home stretch. Ranking ninth in the conference in total offense, ninth in rushing offense and sixth in passing offense, Iowa State also ranks last in the Big 12 in total defense. If K-State can establish a good blend of rushing and passing, the Wildcats could treat home fans to a win.

K-State 38, Iowa State 24

COLORADO

Dan Hawkins' crew has hit hard times. Losing to rival Colorado State, a heartbreaker at Georgia and to Division I-AA Montana State, the hapless Buffaloes look to be the only team not contending for the Big 12 North title. The Buffaloes might be ranked last in the Big 12 in total offense and passing offense, but don't count them out just yet.

K-State 17, Colorado 14

TEXAS

How does a team prepare for their imminent doom? Texas is ranked second in the country in rushing defense, allowing an average of 36.6 yards per game and fourth in the nation in total defense, allowing an average of 225.2 yards per game. Stepping into the shoes of the departed Vince Young is Colt McCoy, who ranks eighth in the nation in passing efficiency with 846 yards this season and 10 touchdowns.

K-State 10, Texas 24

KANSAS

Although Kansas is playing the same "Musical Quarterbacks" game K-State is, the Jayhawks appear to be having more luck with it. Kansas is ranked fifth in passing offense in the conference with an average of 245.6 yards per game and eight touchdowns on the year. However, the part where they are lacking is on the defensive side of the ball. They are ranked second to last in total defense. The battle in Lawrence should end with a K-State victory and bowl trip.

Mistakes keep piling up on the field for K-State

By Jonathan Garten
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When K-State plays Oklahoma State this Saturday, there will be a number of changes to its roster.

The 18-year-old Josh Freeman now will be starting at quarterback. A few yards behind him will be another true freshman, Leon Patton, starting at running back. Red-shirt freshman Brock Unruh, who wasn't even second-string when the season began, will become the third Wildcat to start at right guard this year.

Coach Ron Prince is trying anything to spark an offensive unit that has been one of the worst in recent K-State history. The Wildcats have scored 101 points in their first five games. They haven't started a season this poorly since 1989, when their record was 1-10.

Here is a sequence of changes that must happen for K-State to have an effective offense:

THE FREEMAN FACTOR

This offense needs a playmaker – someone it can rely on to make something happen when things break down.

Dylan Meier's arm strength was not scaring anyone.

"We've had a significant number of plays where the defense thinks it can load the box with eight or nine defenders or blitz at any point," Prince said. "If you're ever going to be able to put drives together, then you will have to be able to exploit one-on-one coverage on the outside."

In the Baylor game, Freeman completed a 68-yard pass to receiver Yamon Figurs. The throw travelled 40 yards in the air with two defenders around Figurs.

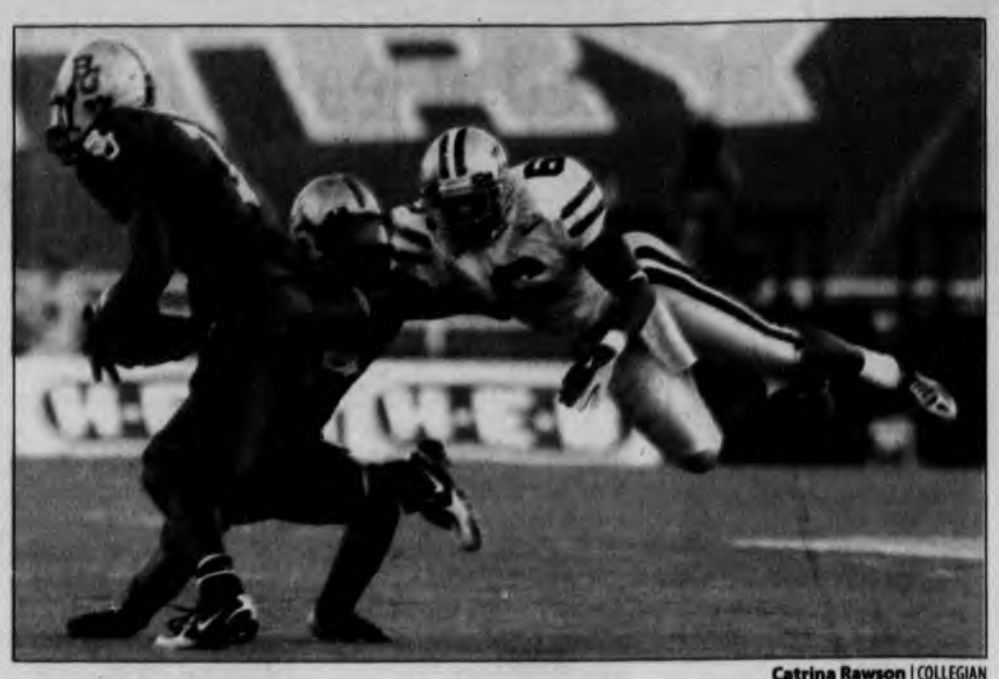
K-State hasn't had anyone who can throw a pass like that since the days when Ell Roberson roamed the backfield. The problem now is that the early Freeman looks even more erratic than the early Roberson did.

"If we don't let them score, then we can win the game. So we have to play that much harder on defense if we're not going to have any help from the offense."

Rob Jackson
DEFENSIVE END

Freeman's numbers – 14-of-47 passing and four interceptions – show his efficiency still has a long way to go. As the season continues, his recognition of coverage and blitzes will need to improve.

OPEN UP THE RUNNING GAME



With Freeman at quarterback, expect to see defenses back off. This should make running the ball a little easier.

The promotion of Patton to starting running back also makes this running game more effective. This year, none of Patton's carries have resulted in negative yards. He takes what the defense gives him, and he makes his move.

Patton's running style is similar to Parrish Fisher, who is rehabbing from an off-season knee injury. Both have the lateral quickness to make plays even when their space is limited.

MAKE THE MOST OF OPPORTUNITIES

The K-State offense has let too many opportunities slip away.

Catrina Rawson | COLLEGIAN
Defense back Byron Garvin misses a tackle during Saturday night's 17-3 loss at Baylor. The defense has held their opponents well below their scoring averages during the last two games, both losses.

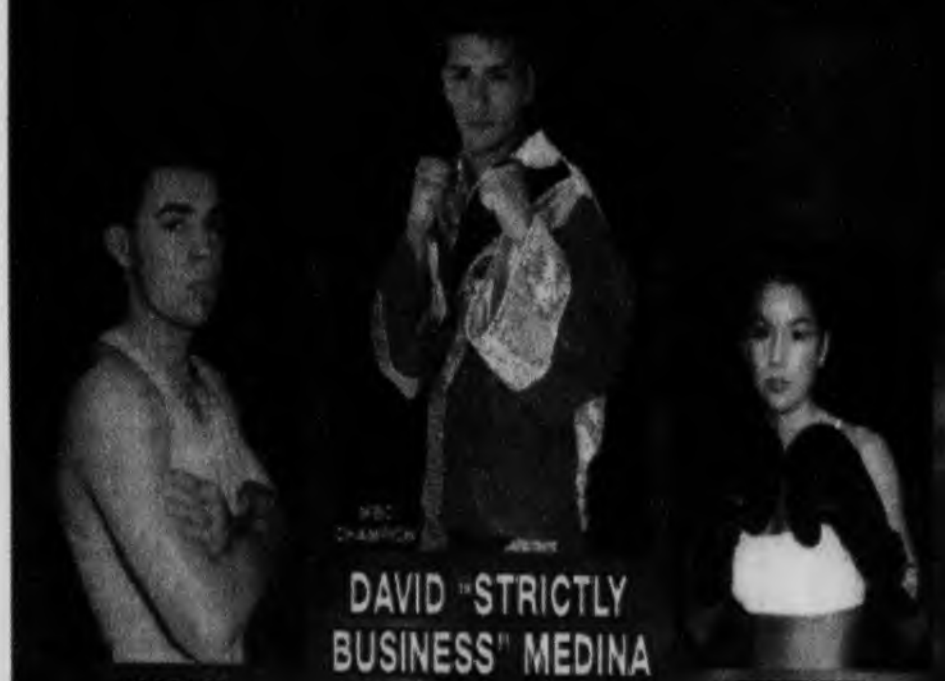
In the last two games, the Wildcats have scored a total of three points from nine drives making it into the opponent's territory. Three times they have stopped themselves by turning over the ball.

The lack of offense has put overwhelming expectations on the defense.

"If we don't let them score, then we can win the game," defensive end Rob Jackson said. "So we have to play that much harder on defense if we're not going to have any help from the offense."

In 2005, the K-State defense intercepted eight passes and had 21 sacks. Through five games this year, the Wildcats have six interceptions and 16 sacks.

The defensive resurgence has been amazing, but it can't be expected carry this team to a bowl game. The offense will have to start doing its part to help the defense.



The last thing K-State wants is a situation like Kansas had last year.

Linebacker Nick Reid got so frustrated with the offensive mishaps that he wanted to "fist fight" his entire offense.

Cooking causes most city fires

By Nicole Johnston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

This week is Fire Prevention Week, and the theme focuses on preventing the leading cause of home fires and injuries – cooking.

According to the National Fire Protection Association, more than 100,000 fires reported each year can be attributed to unsafe cooking and cooking equipment. Most of these fires are started by lack of attention in the kitchen, and the NFPA is using this week to express the importance of safety while cooking.

Donald Francis, assistant chief of the Manhattan Fire Department, said the primary cause of fires in

New program offers master's in children's literature

By Lauren Tice

J.M. Barrie once wrote of a place where kids could go to be immortalized as children.

It was a place where adulthood ranked at the top of children's lists of fears, a place that caused cynical adults to laugh at their children's adamant beliefs of such a utopia.

The popular children's tale of Peter Pan and the magical place of Neverland is one that never seems to be forgotten. It is even possible this story will make the list of children's literature to be included in one of the classes created for the new English graduate program.

The new program introduced this fall by K-State to focus on children's

K-State students, faculty, alumni join K-State Flying Club seeking relaxation, excitement through training as pilots

The autumn sun sank slowly on the distant horizon. Soft shadows fell across the clusters of houses below and obscured the snaking paths of the streets and highways.

The city of Manhattan looked different from a cruising altitude of 3,000 feet – peaceful, quiet.

The fields outside the city limits resembled an elaborate patchwork quilt – each neat square of land borders another of a distinct color and texture.

Ron Jones set his sights on the Tuttle Creek Reservoir from the cockpit of a Piper Arrow Two airplane as his fingers deftly moved across the controls. The water was a deep, sapphire blue, set ablaze by fiery flecks of gold reflected from the setting sun.

"Now you can kind of see what we get excited about up here," Jones said. "Flying is a whole different perspective."

Jones began flying 13 years ago when a friend told him about the K-State Flying Club. Jones said he always had been interested in flying and decided the time was right to pursue a pilot's license.

Seven years later, Jones became the club's president and has encouraged K-State students, faculty and alumni to pursue their own dreams of flight ever since.

Aaron Kaufmann, junior in biological and agricultural engineering, joined the club in May 2006. He said he enjoys flying, because it offers the perfect blend of relaxation and excitement.

"It is a great stress-relieving tool," Kaufmann said. "It also allows me to make quick trips to see family and friends. Every flight has something different about it that makes it memorable, but the excitement I had after making my first solo flight was unreal."

Campaign closes with $7.5K donation for breast cancer research, education, aid

By Willow Williamson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

People wore pink Friday afternoon as they ate hotdogs and chips at a barbecue in front of Weber Hall.

Collegiate Cattlewomen and Sigma Alpha organized the event in honor of Breast Cancer Awareness Month.

Last week, the two organizations sold pink T-shirts for the week-long "Tough Enough to Wear Pink" campaign. The barbecue ended the week. The event raised money for breast cancer awareness.

The money from the shirts was donated to the Susan G. Komen Breast Cancer Foundation. At noon Friday, a check for $7,507 was presented to Karla Schmidt, a representative from the foundation.

"We've had a really good turnout," said Tawnya Roenbaugh, sophomore in food science and Sigma Alpha philanthropy chair. "We completely sold out of shirts."

Pamphlets on breast cancer, self-examinations, what to do if a person might have breast cancer and how people can help were available to attendees.

Those wearing pink at the barbecue were eligible to win prizes donated by local businesses.

"The community has been really supportive," Roenbaugh said.

The Manhattan Fire Department brought one of its fire trucks to the barbecue to show its support for the breast cancer awareness campaign. All the firefighters wore the "Tough Enough to Wear Pink" T-shirt.

Although the foundation is national, the money raised will stay in Kansas, said Crystal Young, senior in animal science and agricultural communications and campaign chairman.

The money will be used for research, education and aid for women who cannot afford exams and treatment.

Organizers planned the campaign to be within the College of Agriculture, but more people got involved than anticipated, Young said. Collegiate Cattlewomen and Sigma Alpha want to make it an annual event.

"It's national Breast Cancer Awareness Month," she said. "We thought it was really important to generate awareness in young people."

IOWA STATE U. REINSTATES FINE DINING COURSE

AMES, Iowa – Move over, Rachael Ray.

Thanks to the comeback of an unusual course in the hotel, restaurant and institution management program, a host of Iowa State University students are learning the sophisticated trade of fine dining.

"When I heard (fine dining management) was offered in the fall, I signed up right away," said Katherine Schmaltz, senior in hotel, restaurant and institution management.

HRI 487, fine dining management, which culminates in four haute cuisine events organized by the students, is now being offered, after a brief interlude when the department was searching for someone to teach it after the former instructor left.

U. MISSISSIPPI LEFT OFF FITTEST CAMPUSES LIST

OXFORD, Miss. – Men's Fitness magazine recently conducted a survey of the fittest college campuses in the United States. The top-ranked schools included Colgate University, Boston College, the University of Vermont and the winner, Dickinson College. But the University of Mississippi was nowhere in the top 25.

"Ole Miss may not be one of the top 25 fittest colleges in America, but it isn't doing too badly, either," said Bill Kingery, director of Campus Recreation. "One can drive around campus and Oxford (Miss.) and see people walking, jogging and cycling."

The top 25 fittest schools all have excellent fitness and recreation facilities and healthy choices in the dining halls. The majority have mandatory physical education courses in their curriculum.

DEAF STUDENTS PROTEST PREJUDICE AT GALLAUDET

WASHINGTON – Students at Gallaudet University remained barricaded inside one of the main campus buildings Friday, protesting the school's presidential selection and what students call a pattern of prejudice at the largely deaf institution.

Ryan Commerson, a student and leader of the protests, said the campus police apparently did not know sign language and could not communicate their concerns to students as they pushed their way in.

A lack of knowledge of sign language by those charged with protecting the students has historically caused troubles at the university not far from the U.S. Capitol, but the school previously has said it took steps to address that problem.

Greeks clean neighborhoods at annual service BBQ

By Regina Nowak
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Andrea Crabaugh usually cringes when she has to pull weeds in her mother's yard.

But raking leaves and picking up trash in her neighbors' yards with other greeks was fun, she said, because it made the companionship made it seem less like a job.

"But it's not just about raking the leaves," she said. "It's where you live."

Crabaugh, sophomore in life science and pre-nursing, was one of about 250 people who participated in the annual Community Service Barbecue and the volunteer work afterward.

Jenna Taylor, junior in business management, said there was a good turnout. Through this barbecue, she said she wants to build community spirit and get to know her neighbors on a different level.

"I want to break the gap between residential houses and greek houses that live in the same neighborhood," she said.

She said she got to know Bud Valerius during last year's barbecue, which made her look forward to this year's event.

Valerius has been living in Manhattan since 1979. Since then, he has missed only one of Delta Delta Delta's barbecues.

"It is a nice way to meet people, and it builds relationships with the greek houses and those that live there," he said.

After participating in the barbecue, some greek house members split into teams and went to residential houses in their neighborhoods to rake leaves and pick up trash.

"I was a little apprehensive this afternoon," Ashley Pruett, freshman in open option, said.

But she said she enjoyed her time raking leaves.

Carolee Stark, Manhattan resident since 1976, said this was a great activity for students.

"It is fun and a great chance to meet the girls and to talk to the neighbors," she said.

Crabaugh hadn't met any of her neighbors before Sunday's barbecue. But that afternoon, it was just another day in the neighborhood.

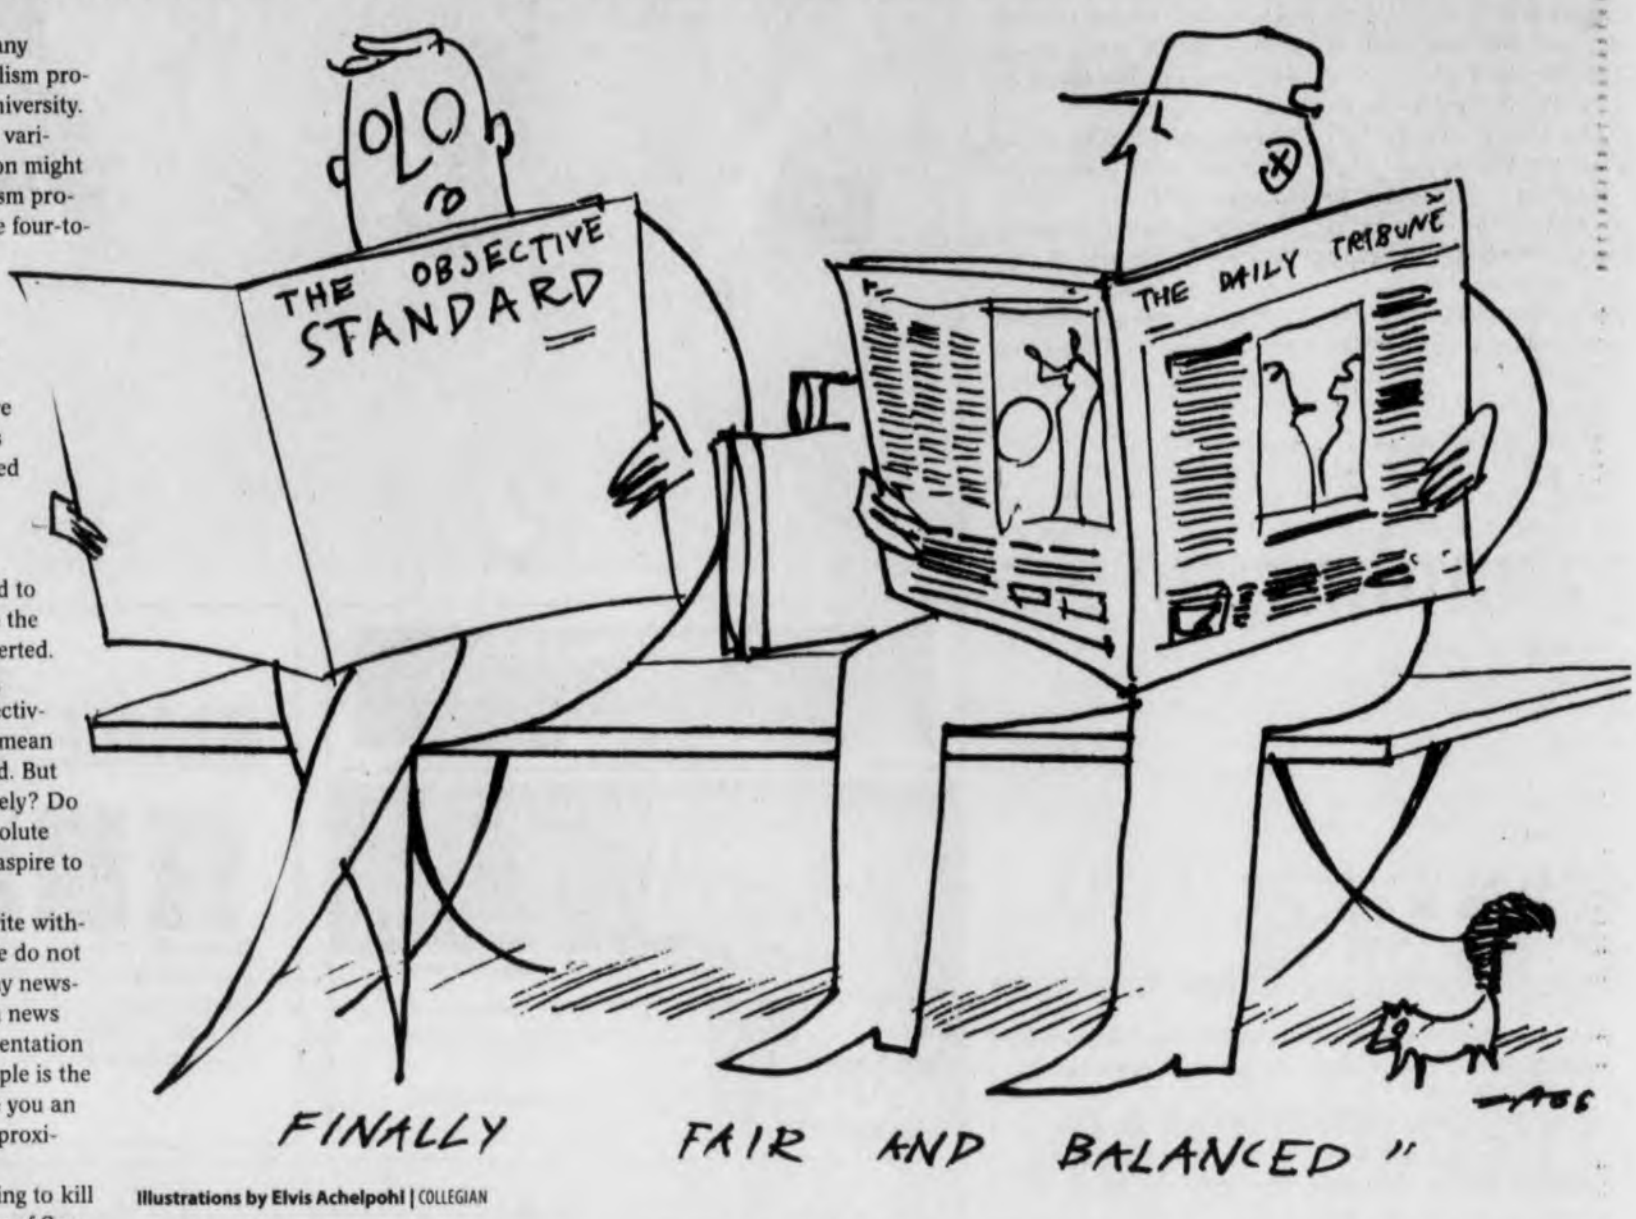
Limit of objectivity

Newspapers offer partial neutrality, compactness to compete with word-of-mouth sources

SHANE SANDERS

As a freshman undergraduate many moons ago, I enrolled in the journalism program at Indiana University.



There are various reasons a person might enroll in a journalism program. Mine was the four-to-one female-male ratio. But alas, my career as a journalism student lasted just one semester. Sure there were plenty of girls there, but at some point, I recognized you need two things to get such a girl – proximity and skills. Being a little short of the second, I left the journalism school and wandered to an unknown part of campus, where the female-male ratio had suddenly inverted.

During my time with journalism, though, I learned to write with objectivity. The term was discussed as if to mean the precision of a scientific standard. But what does it mean to write objectively? Do newspapers produce news with absolute objectivity, and why do journalists aspire to be objective in the first place?

To write objectively means to write without bias. It is my contention that we do not receive absolute objectivity from any newspaper in the world. Implicit in each news writer's choice of material and presentation is an innate human bias. One example is the Dick Cheney hunting story. I'll give you an account of the story that closely approximates absolute objectivity.

"Members of Species A were trying to kill members of Species B. One member of Species A accidentally wounded another member of Species A. The efforts of Species A to kill Species B were abruptly halted, likely sparing multiple members of Species B."

Of course, previous news accounts of this incident were much more concerned with the status of Cheney's fallen hunting partner. Hence, it is clear newspapers cannot simultaneously reflect human values and maintain objectivity in any absolute sense. However, newspapers generally attain some degree of objectivity conditional upon a set of basic human values.

Illustrations by Elvis Achelpohl | COLLEGIAN

But why do journalists practice, even hold as an ideal, any degree of objectivity?

After thinking about the question for a while, I reasoned that people have traditionally switched between formal news media and good old word-of-mouth.

In terms of profitability, it is in the interest of the news industry to differentiate its product from this informal competitor. The news industry does so by offering compactness and some degree of objectivity. The first allows people to access many different stories at the flip of a page (rather than talking to dozens of people).

The second allows people to receive news items without a lot of exaggeration or human error. In other words, people value objectivity to an extent, because it allows them to interpret the news more consistently and with more meaning.

However, people want at least one more thing in reading a newspaper – a reflection of their values in the choice and framing of stories. This is, of course, where objectivity must end. Hence, it appears to be the reader who has the final word in establishing the nature and limitations of journalistic standards.

Alcohol forces social interactions, but doesn't eliminate stress

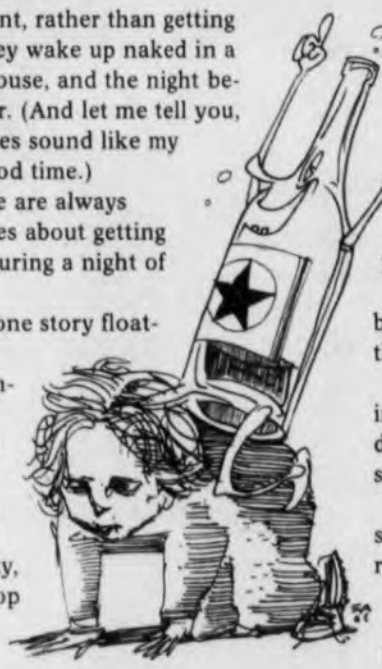
KELSEY CHILDRESS

In 1920-1933, Prohibition made the consumption and brewing of alcohol illegal. In this day and age, that would never pass.

Many people depend on alcohol for all different kinds of things: entertainment, sex appeal, relaxation, escape.

But when it comes down to it, alcohol solves nothing.

In the morning, after all is said and done, drinking doesn't make anything better.



Memories from the previous night might be humorous and forever remembered, but nothing was truly accomplished.

If Prohibition never had been lifted, how would Americans spend their night hours?

College students and bar-hoppers alike would be forced to find other forms of entertainment, rather than getting so drunk they wake up naked in a stranger's house, and the night before is a blur. (And let me tell you, that sure does sound like my idea of a good time.)

And there are always horror stories about getting too drunk during a night of partying.

There is one story floating around about a Manhattan girl who passed out near her car and woke up in Junction City, naked, on top of the trunk of her car.

Another downfall of drinking is the urge to suddenly call every ex-boyfriend or girlfriend who did you wrong, or call some friend at 4 a.m. and try to convince him or her to come out drinking, even though everyone has gone home and the bars (and most house parties) are closed for the evening.

So friends have gone home for the night, but to top off a night of drinking, a meal that you don't really need to eat is required.

Maybe this does slow down the pending doom of a hangover, but it doesn't slow down the time it takes to grow an impressive spare tire around the midsection.

Even though alcohol has its negative sides, there must be some positive, some reason why it was invented.

It does force people to gather together and be social; bonding over alcohol is a fun experience for some. It's an activity people use to find a common ground; it can be used to make some people become friends who usually never would have spoken to one another without it.

However, the main thing people seem to forget about alcohol is that it doesn't care about you.

It doesn't care that it makes you throw up, call the ex you were trying to forget or give you back those five pounds that never seem to go away.

People say alcohol is there for you when you really need it, but that doesn't make sense when all it usually does is either make you sick or allow you to forget. And usually, if trying to forget is what's needed, alcohol has a sneaky way of letting the hurt or stress come back the next day.

TO THE POINT | An editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Children's literature merits serious study, encourages love of reading for a lifetime

Somewhere between Beatrice Potter's "Peter Rabbit" and J.K. Rowling's Harry Potter series, everyone has a favorite story.

Enjoying literature as a child leads to an interest in reading for pleasure as an adult.

K-State's new graduate program in children's literature gives credibility to a genre usually regarded as too simple for study.

Despite belittling opinions, many works of children's literature are far more influential than any adult bestseller could hope to be.

As a society that believes the future is in the hands of our children, it's about time we give credit to a genre that so masterfully molds their imaginations, emotions, hopes and goals.

Children's literature on its own might be powerful, but its power is only magnified when a child experiences it under the guidance of an adult who cherishes and understands the mystery, the meaning and the morals it contains.

This program will train adults to understand these "simple" works that inspire complex learning and development in children.

The more adults understand the multifaceted nature of these works, the more children will be engulfed by literature in the present and for years to come.

This new concentration will change society and positively influence academia.

Gamers spend Friday night sampling future releases

By Regina Nowak
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Alex Burden died four times in seven minutes.

Somebody yelled in the background that the last killing was a clear shot, but Burden didn't give up. He came back and killed his opponent twice in a row.

But it wasn't enough. Two minutes later, he was shot for the fifth time.

Game over.

Although Burden, sophomore in open option, brought his own controller, he was out of luck. Josh Loreman, junior in pre-psychology, was the winner of the main competition of Halo 2 during Friday night's After Hours event in the K-State Student Union Courtyard.

Branden Hofmann, freshman in mechanical engineering, went to the game live tour last year and said he'll be back again in the spring. It gives him something to do other than going out, he said.

"Going to the clubs kind of burned out," Hofmann said.

Jay Kennedy, tour manager, said a video game is a kind of a fantasy.

"It's just like going to a movie or listening to music," he said. "They are providing an escape in some way."

The tour's managers didn't expect many people to attend the event at K-State, but they were surprised, Kennedy said.

"For a Friday night, I'm exceptionally pleased," he said.

About 90 percent of the games presented have not been released yet, so the tour offers a chance to try them before they come on the market, Kennedy said.

Robin Nelson, junior in creative writing and literature, said she loves video games, which is why she decided to come to After Hours with her friends.

"I'm surprised it is that big and that there are so many games I'm interested in," she said.

Steve Arnold, freshman in information sciences, said he has never been to a college event like this before but said it was a fun event.

For him, video games are a good stress reliever and a chance to relax, as well as a great way to meet friends online.

"As the gaming industry has been evolving, you can see new social possibilities you wouldn't have thought of before," he said.

Campus groups arrange panels, voter drives before elections

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Midterm elections are approaching, and many campus organizations are working to increse voter awareness.

The KSU College Republicans will bring in various speakers to address issues at the forefront of the upcoming elections at 8 tonight on the second floor of the K-State Student Union.

Guests include local candidates Bob Strawn and Dick Miller, both Republican candidates for the Kansas House of Representatives.

Strawn is running against Democrat Sydney Carlin, and Miller faces Democrat Tom Hawk.

Ann Ryun, wife of Rep. Jim Ryun, R-Kan., and Ron Freeman, father of K-State football quarterback Josh Freeman and executive director for the Republican party, also will speak.

This week Alpha Phi Alpha fraternity will have a voter registration drive and a political awareness campaign known as "A voteless people is a hopeless people," said Careem Gladney, vice president of Alpha Phi Alpha.

The campaign was initiated as a national program of the fraternity during the 1930s, when African-Americans had the right to vote but were discouraged from doing so, Gladney said.

"Since 2006 is an election year, we want to make sure that we are doing all that we can to get our K-State community involved and registered to vote," he said.

"Our goal is to have between 350-400 students, faculty and visitors to Kansas State registered to vote by the end of the week."

There will be a voter registration table set up from 9 a.m. to 2 p.m. today through Friday in the Union, Gladney said.

"Voting is power," he said. "There should be some significance in why you are voting. Students must understand the dynamics of what they are trying to change."

Various organizations on campus will participate in this event, including the KSU Young Democrats and the Black Student Union.

"We are all working towards a common goal for people to vote and be educated on the issues, regardless what candidiate they are voting for," Gladney said.

Aaron Apel, president of Young Democrats, said the group will participate in "A voteless people is a hopeless people" with Alpha Phi Alpha.

Young Democrats will facilitate a panel called "Voting Rights Awareness" at 7 p.m. Oct. 17 in the Little Theatre, said Mark Nelson, vice president of Young Democrats.

At the panel, student leaders will express the importance of knowing one's rights as a voter, Nelson said.

Young Democrats members also are creating pamphlets to distribute to students before the elections to inform them about the candidates, Apel said.

Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said it is important for students to vote and be educated about candidates.

"In this day in age, with increases in tuition and the reduction of support for higher institution we get from the Legislature, students need to be informed about important issues when it comes to voting," he said.

Students also are becoming more active in the campaign process for individual candidates, Ben Davis, president of College Republicans, said.

"We have students helping put out yard signs, pass out literature and also getting involved with national campaigns, such as Congressman Jim Ryun," Davis said.

Davis said voting affects students' lives on both national and local levels.

"Eventually, a lot of us will be running for office or in leadership positions, and a lack of interest for voting will not benefit," he said.

Breakthrough performer

Leon Patton — Running back

The running back set a freshman record, finishing with 301 all-purpose yards. It was the first time a Wildcat has had more than 300 all-purpose yards since Darren Sproles set the school record with 351 yards against Louisiana-Lafayette on Sept. 18, 2004.

Turning point

Fourth quarter: Josh Freeman completes pass to Jermaine Moreira.

With about four minutes to play in the game, the 12-yard completion to Moreira didn't seem like a big deal, but it was the beginning of K-State's comeback. Including that pass, Freeman completed six straight passes for 128 yards, leading the Wildcats back from 10 points down. Freeman finished the game 10-of-15 for 177 yards.

The Wildcats have scored 67 of their 132 points on special teams play (including points after touchdown). The special teams have been responsible for 51 percent of the Wildcats' total offense this season. K-State has four scores on special teams this season.

Game MVP

It would be easy to give the award to either true freshmen Josh Freeman or Leon Patton, but safety Marcus Watts sealed K-State's victory on Saturday. Not only did Watts block a punt in the second quarter that set up the first touchdown of the game, but he made the plays at the end of the game to secure the win. Watts' hit on Oklahoma State's Adarius Bowman during the final seconds saved K-State, but his interception on the final play secured the come-from-behind win.

Prince's bet on Freeman pays off

AUSTIN MEEK

Call it prophecy or just a well-executed game plan, but Ron Prince saw this one coming.

At his Tuesday media conference, Prince stated his expectations for true freshman quarterback Josh Freeman.

"Just play well if you can," Prince said. "Then, in the fourth quarter, be prepared to be a hero."

In K-State's 31-27 victory against Oklahoma State, that's exactly what Freeman did. He managed the game for three quarters, and then he saved K-State's collective bacon in the fourth.

Against Baylor, watching Freeman throw passes was like watching cheerleaders chuck T-shirts into a crowd. But even then, Prince knew Freeman was close.

Through three quarters against, Freeman wasn't spectacular. He looked a bit indecisive, unsettled.

"Hmm," I thought. "This Freeman kid sure has a pretty hand-off. But couldn't Dylan Meier do that?"

But man, that fourth quarter was something special.

"He was like a little field general out there," offensive lineman Brock Unruh said.

To clarify, Napoleon was a little field general. At 6-foot-6, 240 pounds, there's nothing little about Freeman.

Freeman has the tools to excel. But the intangibles, the ability to step up when the game was on the line – nobody could predict that.

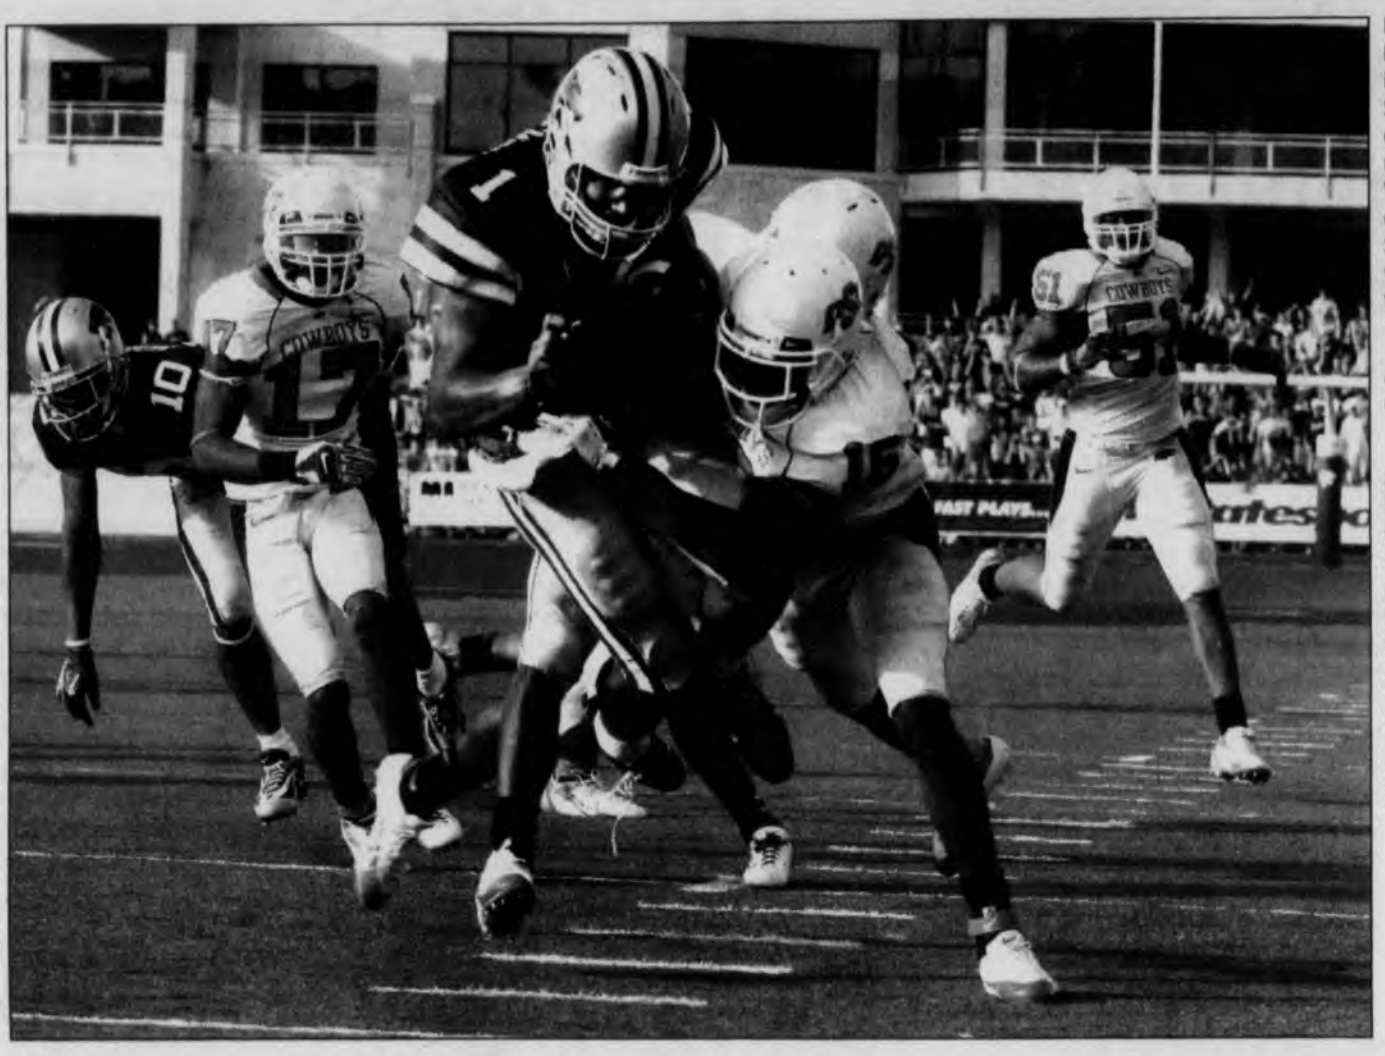
Nobody except Prince.

Was Saturday's game vindication for Prince? He would never say so, of course.

But let's be honest: Prince needed this. Matt Boss' sudden departure raised a lot of questions, as did Prince's handling of the the quarterback situation with the media after the Baylor loss. The offensive line seemed a more random selection than a Gallup poll.

That's why Prince needed the Freeman gamble to pay off.

Granted, this was just one game against a team with a suspect defense. Nebraska could turn Freeman back into a confused, interception-chucking freshman.



But on this one perfect, sun-drenched Saturday afternoon, everybody at Snyder Family Stadium saw what Prince already knew.

Freeman is ready to be a hero.

New quarterback Josh Freeman was as advertised in his first career start, but the other true freshman in the backfield almost upstaged him in K-State's thrilling 31-27 come-from-behind victory Saturday over Oklahoma State.

Leon Patton, a freshman running back from Cedar Hill, Texas, who was virtually unknown to most of those in attendance, totaled 151 yards and a touchdown on the ground, and also scored on a 95-yard kickoff return.

Patton displayed the type of big-play ability the Wildcats (4-2 overall, 1-1 Big 12) have needed, finishing with 301 all-purpose yards, including six plays from scrimmage that went for 12 or more yards.

After the game, Patton said he surprised even himself with how well he played, but he was quick to credit his teammates.

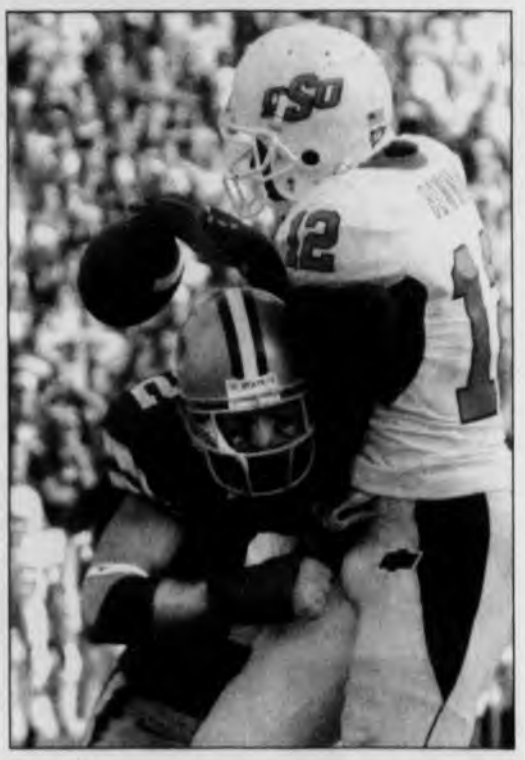
"They just created the holes, and I hit them," he said. "I had a great day, because our offense, as a whole, had a great day."

Trailing 27-17 with 4:25 to play in the game, the Wildcats were forced to turn to Freeman to bring them back. After throwing only six passes in the first three quarters, Freeman engineered a six-play, 92-yard drive that ended with a Patton one-yard touchdown run to put the score at 27-24.

Coach Ron Prince elected not to attempt the onside kick, putting pressure on his defense to force a punt. The defense responded, giving K-State the ball back with 1:54 to play.

"(Josh) was calm like he was the whole game," offensive lineman Greg Wafford said. "The coaches just said, 'Do your job. Go make a play.'"

Freeman took his coaches' advice, capping a quick 58-yard drive with a 21-yard touchdown run that sent the crowd into a frenzy.

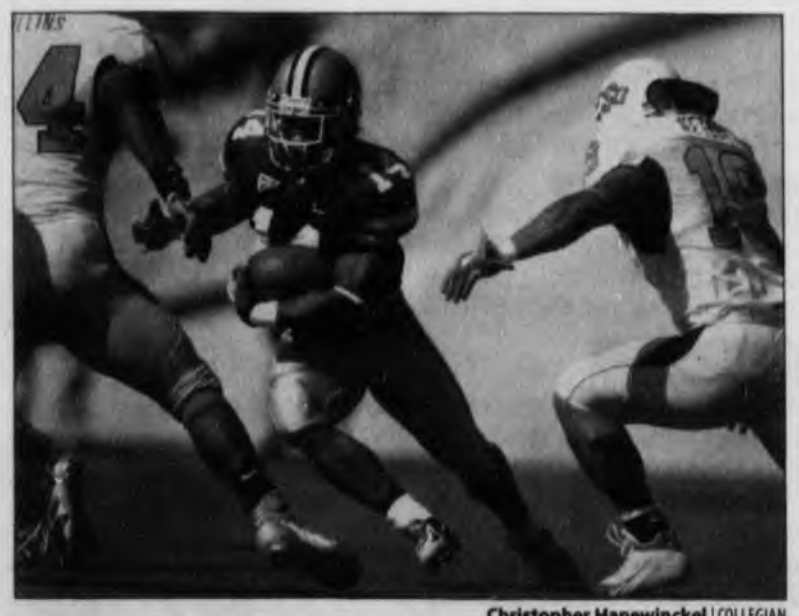


"Adrenaline took over, and I just took off," Freeman said. "The line did a great job opening the middle up. (Jermaine) Moreira had a great block on that play, and anybody could have scored."

The run gave the Wildcats a 31-27 lead, but certainly did not put the game out of reach for the Cowboys (3-2, 0-1 Big 12).

Oklahoma State quarterback Bobby Reid, who threw for 138 yards and two touchdowns, threw four separate passes to the end zone from inside the K-State 30-yard line, but none found the hands of his receivers.

The final throw was intercepted by safety Marcus Watts, the last of several game-changing plays Watts made.



"We're always confident," Watts said. "We knew we could give them the short stuff if they wanted to take it. They tried to get some deep stuff on us, but some players made big plays, and that's something we credit our defense with is we're playmakers."

The defense was sound, but the play of K-State's two newest – and youngest – stars was the story of the game.

After leading the Wildcats back from a 10-point deficit in the final quarter by completing 6-of-9 passes for 128 yards; it caused some of Freeman's teammates to doubt whether he was really a true freshman.

Freshman duo ignites K-State offense

By Jonathan Garten
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After losing to Baylor 17-3, it was clear something had to change on the offensive side of the ball.

The running game stalled, averaging only 2.1 yards per carry against the Bears. The passing game wasn't much better, completing only 40 percent of its passes. K-State even struggled deep inside Baylor territory, turning the ball over three times inside the Bears' 25-yard line.

The Wildcats' answer to all these problems appeared to be rearranging the depth chart. Josh Freeman and Leon Patton created a rare combination for K-State – two true freshmen starting in the same backfield.

There also was a fair amount of shuffling on the offensive line. Caleb Handy, Brock Unruh and Brad Rooker all got their first starts of the season, and Greg Wafford was moved from left guard to left tackle.

Here are a few reasons why these switches were so important in K-State's 31-27 win over Oklahoma State.

RUNNING GAME

Heading into Saturday's game, all eyes were on Freeman. Everyone expected the Wildcat offense to rely solely on the arm of the young quarterback. But it was the other true freshman who stole the show.

Patton found holes, made cuts and broke tackles all day long. Every time his team needed a big play, he delivered.

"I couldn't do it by myself," Patton said. "They created the holes, and I just hit them."

A humble response from a guy whose first start resulted in more than 150 yards rushing. The line deserves credit, but Patton was making plays even when holes weren't there.

The K-State women's volleyball team responds after dropping the third-straight game during its match against Colorado Saturday. The loss lengthened the Wildcats' losing streak to eight matches.

K-State dealt 2nd-straight sweep in 'frustrating' loss to Colorado

K-State women's volleyball coach Suzie Fritz tracked down Colorado senior Ashley Nu'u, a player she coached during the offseason on the USA Volleyball A2 Team in New Orleans, and gave her a hug after Saturday night's match at Ahearn Field House.

After losing 3-0 to the Buffaloes – the Wildcats' eighth-straight defeat dating back to Sept. 9 – maybe somebody should give Fritz a hug.

The Wildcats lost each game by two points (31-29, 30-28, 34-32) and have been swept in consecutive matches for the first time since 2005, when the Wildcats lost back-to-back matches to Missouri and Texas.

"I have a set of expectations that I know we have to meet to be successful," Fritz said. "Those objectives, those expectations, are not being met, and so that is frustrating."

The Wildcats (8-9, 0-7 Big 12) started the match slow, falling behind in game one by scores of 13-7 and 16-8.

However, a string of kills by senior outside hitter Sandy Werner got the team going, and soon enough, the Wildcats were tied with the Buffaloes at 29-29. A service error by sophomore defensive specialist Leslie Townsend and a kill by Colorado's Alex Buth gave the Buffaloes the opening game 31-29.

In game two, freshman middle blocker Kelsey Chipman recorded six kills. As a team, the Wildcats out-hit the Buffaloes .314 to .208, but they still were unable to pull off the win. Trailing 24-22, the Buffaloes scored three straight points to take the lead. The Wildcats tied the game at 28-28 after an attack error by Nu'u but could not capitalize. The Buffaloes scored on consecutive kills to take the second game 30-28.

"We're not stringing enough quality plays together to win the tight ones," Fritz said.

After the break, the Wildcats came out displaying more energy than the previous two games and found themselves ahead 23-18. After fending off a Colorado rally, the Wildcats had game point at 32-31. But three straight attack errors – two by Werner and one by Chipman – gave the Buffaloes the win.

"We wanted that game so bad," junior setter Stacey Spiegelberg said. "It's just really frustrating it didn't go our way."

WILDCATS WIN 12 AT HOOSIER CLASSIC

The Wildcat women's tennis team closed out a weekend of strong performances at the Indiana Hoosier Classic with two doubles wins on Sunday.

Freshman Natasha Vieira and junior Tereza Prochazkova won in round-robin play against another Notre Dame tandem before dropping a match to Indiana. Both Wildcat doubles teams went 2-2 at the tournament.

Overall, the tournament was successful for K-State. Yrureta won three singles matches to capture the Flight A championship.

Prochazkova and Vieira both went 2-1 in round-robin play, and Kudlackova finished 1-2 in the Flight C draw.

OFFENSE | Freeman plays flawlessly in final drive

That extra spark was something former starter Thomas Clayton was not able to provide.

Oklahoma State's run defense has been suspect, giving up 196 yards on the ground in a loss to Houston. The real challenge will be running the ball effectively for the rest of the Big 12 season.

4TH-QUARTER COMEBACK

When coach Ron Prince was asked what he expected out of Freeman in his first start he said he wanted his quarterback to play well and then be prepared to be a hero in the fourth quarter.

It's safe to say Freeman met those expectations.

For three quarters he remained quiet, passing the ball only six times. But he stepped up when his team needed him late in the game.

With less than five minutes left in the game and down by 10 points, Freeman led a six-play, 92-yard touchdown drive. He completed 4-of-5 passes for 91 yards, including a pair of passes to Jermaine Moreira few quarterbacks could have made.

Freeman – who has been described by some as strictly a passer – silenced his critics once again by putting the Wildcats up for good on a 21-yard touchdown run.

This game should be the blueprint of how they use Freeman in the future. Establish a running game and then let him pass the ball in the clutch.

COMEBACK | K-State gets 1st South win since OU

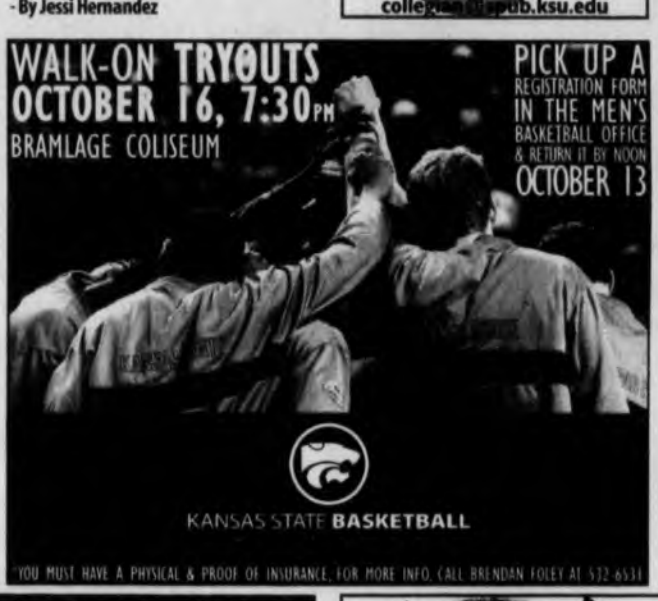
"(Josh) was so calm, confident in the huddle," Wafford said.

"He managed the game very well. He just seemed like another veteran football player out there, ready to go make a play."

It was K-State's first win over a Big 12 South opponent since defeating Oklahoma in the 2003 Big 12 Championship.



It might give the Wildcats confidence heading into next week's matchup with rival Nebraska.

Freeman said his first start wasn't quite how he imagined it.

"I envisioned a blowout, but you can't always have everything you want," he said. "But it was good to get the win."

FIRE | Smoking tops causes of fire-related deaths

Manhattan is cooking.

"We get called out for fires about three or four times a day," Francis said.

The NFPA recommends these cooking safety tips:

- Pay attention to your cooking. Stay in the kitchen when frying, grilling, broiling or boiling any food.
- If you must leave the kitchen, even for a short period, turn off the stove.
- When you are baking or simmering food, use a timer and stay in the home.
- If young children are around, use the back burners if possible.
- When cooking, wear clothing with tight-fitting sleeves.
- Once you are finished cooking, remember to turn off all burners and ovens.

Cooking is the leading cause of home fires and injury, but cigarettes, electrical equipment, candles and heating equipment also are serious fire hazards.

Smoking is the leading cause of fire-related deaths in the United States. To reduce the risk of fire, smokers can use designated smoking areas outside the home, use deep, sturdy ashtrays, and smoke away from anything flammable.

Francis said the start of winter is the busiest time for firefighters. Many people are unaware that they need to check their furnaces and chimneys before using them, Francis said.

The observation of Fire Prevention Week started in 1871 after a fire damaged much of Chicago on Oct. 9 of that year. Ever since, fire departments nationwide have taken action the week of Oct. 9, Francis said.

Fire departments use this week to visit elementary schools and teach students about the importance of fire safety.

Summer Lunsway, Manhattan resident, said it is vital for children to know fire safety.

"I think the biggest part of it is the public relations and getting children to know that the firefighters are here for them," Lunsway said.

LITERATURE | Undergraduate degree possible

literature was established to accommodate faculty strengths and the high student demand for children's literature classes.

K-State became the first Big 12 Conference school and the 10th U.S. university to offer this type of graduate program, said Philip Nel in a press release. Nel is an associate professor of English and director of the new graduate program.

Some think children's literature is too simple to study, especially at a graduate level.

"It is fun to take children's literature seriously," Nel said. "Though the works' intended readers may have less height and vocabulary than adults do, children's literature is as much an art form as literature for grown-ups."

Nel said the program is open to anyone interested in children's literature. He said he predicts the new program will bring more graduate students to K-State, specifically students in the fields of education and library science.

"We're the only university within 500 miles to offer an M.A. in English with a concentration in children's literature," Nel said. "So we're filling a need not only for the people of Kansas but for others in the region who are interested in graduate study in children's literature."

Melissa Glaser, graduate student in the program, said she decided to join it because her favorite part of teaching is reading with children.

Glaser is interested in pursuing a doctorate in children's literature so she can be a professor of children's literature.

"I am also interested in working in the education field – with teachers, parents and children – as well as in the public sector – libraries, community service/outreach," Glaser said. "I believe that knowledge of children's literature offers a number of possibilities."

Undergraduate students will be eligible to enroll in any of the new 600-level classes. However, any class over the 600-level is restricted to graduate students only.

The new graduate program brings hope to the Department of English, Nel said.

"We hope that the graduate program will make an undergraduate certificate (in children's literature) possible," he said.

Your professor may not always be there for you.
Your roommates might not always be there for you
And your family, well you can't really trust them either.
But the Collegian Crossword. . .
Now that's something you can bank on.

CLUB | Challenge, skills, freedom motivate pilots

which Kaufmann said makes it much easier for a student like him to learn to fly.

"The Flying Club is a great opportunity to get started, because they offer the best rental rates, and their focus is to give students an opportunity to fly," he said. "I began flying this May, and I am preparing to take my final exams to receive my private pilot's certificate."

Whether a club member has been flying for a few months like Kaufmann, or more than a decade like himself, Jones said the Flying Club is a safety-oriented organization for all pilots. Checks on new members' driving records and annual checkouts with flight instructors to review emergency procedures are a few of the precautions the club takes.

Beyond following the standard safety precautions, Jones said the best pilots possess several traits that distinguish them from others.

"I think that one of the things that makes a good pilot is one who's good analytically, who is able to understand a little bit about what's going on with the airplane and understands the systems involved," he said. "Part of your training deals with that, but flying, like so many other things that we do, is a continual learning process.

"I think that a person who has that goal to just continually learn more about it as they go along – that's a good trait to have."

Dedicating the time and effort required to become a pilot has many benefits, Jones said. Traveling, especially long distances, is faster and does not require booking an airline ticket months in advance. Passengers on a private plane also do not have to deal with the congestion common at many airports after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

While each club member has a different reason for wanting to learn to fly, Jones said he is still motivated by the high demands of being a good pilot and the freedom it offers.

Flying the four-person plane, Ron Jones circles Manhattan. The Piper is one of five planes owned by the Flying Club.

Joslyn Brown
COLLEGIAN

"I like the challenge of flying," he said. "It's not like hopping in your car and driving mindlessly down the road. Your mind is engaged all the time that you're in the aircraft.

"I also enjoy the freedom of being able to plan a flight and come out here and go – halfway across the country if I want to. It's a great mode of transportation."

Scorsese's retu

'The Departed' marks director's reappearance at top of crime genre

Reviewed by Brandon Prenger

Over the course of Martin Scorsese's last few films, we've seen "The Gangs of New York," an overstuffed period piece with a running time of about 14 hours; "The Aviator," a slightly above-average Howard Hughes biopic with a running time of about 14 hours; and "No Direction Home: Bob Dylan," an excellent documentary with only one key flaw: it reminds us how much Bob Dylan sucks now compared to the good old days. Oh, yeah, it also has a running time of about 14 hours.

Scorsese is coming far too close to joining the pretentious group of directors who can't seem to match the quality of their old work: George Lucas, Oliver Stone, Woody Allen and even Steven Spielberg (who will never top "Indiana Jones and the Last Crusade" – not even "Schindler's List 2" could match that masterpiece) seem to be bringing less excitement to the screen with each subsequent film.

Luckily, with "The Departed," Scorsese returns to the crime genre that includes his best films, and it's about damn time.

The cast is incredible, down to even the smallest supporting role, the story is anything but predictable, a rarity in Hollywood these days, and the music, which includes songs from The Rolling Stones and The Dropkick Murphys, helps drive the film from its gripping opening through its explosive finish.

"The Departed," a remake of the Hong Kong film "Infernal Affairs," follows the story of two Massachusetts State Police officers on opposite sides of the law. Billy Costigan (Leonardo DiCaprio) is an undercover agent working for Irish-mob boss Frank Costello (Jack Nicholson). Colin Sullivan (Matt Damon) is a rising star in the Special Investigations Unit who also happens to be one of Costello's informants. As each side realizes it has a mole in its midst, lies unravel, hidden identities are revealed, and plenty of innocent victims die in the process.

In my mind, DiCaprio has never really escaped the image of the angst-ridden teenager he played in "Titanic" and "The Aviator" he always seemed out of place, but not here. DiCaprio never truly fits the part of a state police officer, but after going undercover and being sent to prison for a phony assault charge, he emerges as an angry young criminal, thirsty for a chance to prove himself to Boston's evil crime boss. He's tough and arrogant when he's with the criminals, and he's scared and impatient when he's with the police, but his performance never falters. He's come a long way from his "Titanic" days.

Damon is equally impressive as the detective with an immaculate résumé. His confidence slowly unravels throughout the movie as the weight of being a double agent comes down from both sides.

After a couple of comedic roles, Nicholson plays a villain again, and it would be hard to ask for a better result. He finds time to snort cocaine off of hookers and confront clergymen about their relationships with altar boys, all while growing increasingly paranoid of the loyalty of his employees. He's the pure embodiment of evil, but he's charismatic and entertaining enough to be charming and terrifying at the same time.

There's no shortage of big names in the supporting cast either. Martin Sheen and Mark Wahlberg both bring their "A" games, but Alec Baldwin easily steals every scene he's in. Pay special attention to his monologue describing to Damon the benefits of marriage. The colorful dialogue makes every scene enjoyable, no matter how irrelevant it might seem at the time.

At 149 minutes, one could assume Scorsese is still trying to pack too much into a film, but fortunately, that's not the case. Every scene either advances the plot or adds to the development of some of the best characters Scorsese has put on the screen in the past decade. Best of all, the ending will surprise you, but not in a cheap, predictable way that's all-too-common in movies these days.

Anyone who reminisces of the time Scorsese pumped out brilliant crime dramas like "Goodfellas" and "Casino" can breathe a sigh of relief. "The Departed" isn't his best film, but topping "Goodfellas" is asking a lot.

At its worst, "The Departed" is enjoyable enough to recommend to anyone who enjoys crime films. At its best, it represents yet another shot at the best director Oscar that's evaded Scorsese for his entire career.

FAST FACTS, "THE DEPARTED"

- Martin Scorsese wanted to shoot the film in Boston, where the story is set. Due to concerns on setting up production and politics, however, the producers chose New York City to double for Boston because of the state's 15-percent tax credit. The bulk of the movie was shot in New York City, while a six-week shooting schedule was split in two for Boston, shooting the first half in June and the second half in August.
- Gerard McSorley was originally slated to play Queenan but had to drop out of the project.
- As research for his character's occupation, Matt Damon worked with a Massachusetts State Police unit out of Boston. He accompanied them on routine patrols, participated in a drug raid and was taught proper police procedures like how to pat down a suspect.
- Originally, Jack Nicholson turned down his role in the movie, but after a meeting with Martin Scorsese and Leonardo DiCaprio, he was convinced to play the role of Frank Costello. He joined the production because he had done a few comedies and wanted to play a villain again. He reportedly considered the character of Costello to be the ultimate incarnation of evil.
- Robert De Niro was set to play the police chief, Oliver Queenan, but his commitment to his directorial feature, "The Good Shepherd," (2006) forced him to drop out.
- The film's technical advisor was Tom Duffy, a retired detective who worked out of Boston for nearly 30 years and specialized in organized crime. He was particularly involved in the case against notorious South Boston gangster Whitey Bulger, whom Jack Nicholson's Costello is partly based on.
- Martin Scorsese originally wanted to cast a known actress, either Kate Winslet or Hilary Swank, for the part of Madeleine. But he later decided to go with a lesser-known actress, Vera Farmiga.
- Leonardo DiCaprio was cast in the title role in "The Good Shepherd," but he dropped out to play Billy Costigan in this movie.

Fawcett diagnosed, battles intestinal cancer

Original Charlie's Angel and 1970s bombshell Farrah Fawcett has confirmed that she is battling intestinal cancer.

The 59-year-old actress recently underwent surgery to remove a tumor found in her lower intestine and is expected to have more radiation treatment and complete a course of chemotherapy.

"Throughout the journey of my life, I have maintained a strong faith in the power of the human spirit to overcome adversity," Fawcett said in a statement Friday. "I deeply believe in one's own positive will to overcome even the most daunting challenges.

Pitt, Jolie mobbed in India

PUNE, India — (Associated Press) Brad Pitt and Angelina Jolie, in India to shoot scenes for a movie about the slain journalist Daniel Pearl, went on an autorickshaw ride with their 5-year-old son on Sunday.

They were chased by photographers, cameramen and reporters, forcing them to turn back after a 20-minute ride that took them past shops and department stores in downtown Pune, in western India.

Several traffic signals slowed their short rickshaw ride. At every red light, security men traveling in a rickshaw behind jumped out and surrounded the three-wheeler to prevent the media from snapping pictures of Pitt and Jolie.

They then returned to the Le Meridian hotel where they have been holed up since arriving on Thursday.

Security for the star couple has been tight since their arrival in Pune by private jet along with their children Maddox, 5, Zahara, 18 months, and 4-month-old Shiloh Nouvel Jolie-Pitt.

THIS WEEK... A look at events that occurred during this week in history, other bizarre holidays, happenings

TUESDAY 1845: U.S. Naval Academy opens in Maryland

United States Naval Academy opened at Annapolis, Md., on this day in history. The academy is for training young men and women to be officers of the U.S. Navy or Marine Corps. George Bancroft, Secretary of the Navy, founded and opened it in 1845 as the Naval School at Annapolis. During the Civil War, it was moved to Newport, R.I., but returned in 1865. Women have been admitted to the academy since 1976.

WEDNESDAY 1939: Einstein warns president about bombs

Based on recent research, Albert Einstein wrote a letter to President Franklin Delano Roosevelt about the possibility of using uranium to initiate a nuclear chain reaction, the fundamental process behind the atomic bomb. The letter, known as the Einstein-Szilárd letter, was sent to Roosevelt in August 1939. It was signed by Einstein but largely written by Leó Szilárd in consultation with fellow Hungarian physicists Edward Teller and Eugene Wigner. It said Nazi Germany might have the ability to produce the bombs.

THURSDAY 1810: Oktoberfest begins in Bavaria

With Bavarian Crown Prince Louis' marriage Princess Therese von Sachsen-Hildburghausen, citizens of Munich were invited to attend royal festivities.

The decision to repeat the festivities in the subsequent year gave rise to the tradition of the annual Oktoberfest, which now begins in late September and lasts until the first Sunday in October. Alcohol consumption is an important part of the modern festival, and more than 1 million gallons of beer are consumed annually at Oktoberfest.

FRIDAY International Egg Day

In an effort to eat affordably, nutritionally and easily during International Egg Day, try incorporating eggs into your diet.

Current statistics show an increase from 233.5 eggs per capita consumption in 1991 to a projected 261 eggs per capita consumed in 2002.

Eggs have a lot to offer. In August, the American Council of Science and Health said abstaining from eggs is actually unwise. Abstaining means consumers miss out on all of eggs' positive aspects, like variety in the diet, a high nutrient value, low cost, convenience and usefulness in recipes.

Debra Davis, executive director of the Gender Education Center, describes how sexual orientation differs from gender identity during a speech about life as a transgendered individual Monday evening in Forum Hall.

'Transgender' includes all people who cross norms, speaker says

By Megan Molitor
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Transgendered individuals face many issues and questions, and Debra Davis does her best to address them.

Davis spoke Monday evening in Forum Hall as part of the national "Coming Out" week. She is a transgendered person and has been out as one since 1998.

She was introduced by Kyle Malone, co-chair of the Union Program Council.

"Debra Davis is dedicated to support advocacy and education and has won many awards because of it," Malone said. "She was one of the first people to be transgendered and work with children successfully, as she is a retired high school librarian."

Davis took the stage and spoke to a crowd of about 70 people, and she used her energetic personality to describe her life.

"Being transgendered is a lifetime process," she said. "I feel that being so is only a small piece of who I am, and it can get blown out of proportion."

Davis, the executive director of the Gender Education Center, described the term "transgender" as "a broad term used to encompass all manifestations of crossing gender barriers. It includes all who cross-dress or otherwise transgress gender norms and all others who wish to belong."

She explained there is a difference between sexual orientation and gender identity.

"Sexual orientation is about who you love, and gender identity is about who you believe you are," Davis said. "We don't line up how society wants us to, and a majority of society can't differentiate between the two."

Davis said there are many common traits among transgendered people, like always feeling different, feeling ashamed about their secret, and having a first memory of dressing in clothes of the other gender. She also said many believe they are gay or lesbian.

Andrew Haworth, freshman in political science, and Jesse Burkett, freshman in environmental design, respond to a comment made by Davis about the steps performed during a transgender surgery.

"I took a look at the gay box, which I believed to be a man attracted to another man, and I thought, 'Well, I'm not attracted to men, but I don't consider myself a man,'" she said.

An overwhelming majority of transgendered individuals are closet crossdressers, Davis said. Many do so in the privacy of their homes, and 23 percent of their partners don't know.

"I had many boxes of tools in my garage, and many people didn't know that they didn't contain any tools," she said. "They actually contained some pretty interesting stuff."

She also spoke about the secret lives of transgendered people with

World rebukes N. Korea

WASHINGTON – The world community condemned on Monday North Korea's testing of nuclear weapons.

"This is a clear sign the rogue regime in North Korea is desperate and has no interest in peace and no interest in helping its people," Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., said in a news release.

Kim Jong Il
LEADER OF NORTH KOREA

Facing the prospect of a nuclear-armed North Korea, President Bush on Monday called the communist regime's claim of a nuclear test a provocative act and warned Pyongyang against exporting nuclear materials.

"Once again, North Korea has defied the will of the international community, and the international community will respond," Bush said.

Other world leaders joined Bush in calling for an immediate and harsh rebuke from the United Nations against North Korean leader Kim Jong Il, who wants to join the club of nuclear-armed nations.

Bush has made national security a key issue in the midterm Congressional elections, and Democrats said North Korea's success in raising the stakes in the nuclear standoff was evidence that Bush's policy was flawed.

The president called the leaders of South Korea, Russia, Japan and China, and he said each reaffirmed a commitment to a nuclear-free Korean peninsula. At the United Nations, the United States proposed stringent sanctions, including a trade ban on military and luxury items, the power to inspect all cargo entering or leaving the country, and freezing assets connected with its weapons programs.

While concerned that North Korea could use a nuclear weapon offensively, the United States is equally worried about it selling nuclear materials or weapons to others. North Korea is believed to have enough plutonium for as few as four and as many as a dozen nuclear bombs.

Bush said North Korea already is one of the world's leading proliferators

Privilege Fee Committee approves mechanical repairs in Union

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Privilege Fee Committee made legislation changes and financial decisions last night in a meeting with the directors of the K-State Student Union and the SafeRide Program.

Members of the committee met in the Office of Student Activities and Services with Bernard Pitts, executive director of the Union; Jack Connaughton, associate director of the Union; and John Bergin, director of SafeRide.

Pitts discussed different contract issues for the Union, including items needing to be replaced, lighting and sound improvements, and the increasing utilities bill.

"This year we have some challenges," Pitts said.

Pitts addressed mechanical repairs, mostly air handlers in the Union, that need to be made. He said money was set aside in 2000 for renovations, but the repairs were delayed for two years, and additional funds were collected. That money went toward infrastructure components, but the improvements were not outwardly visible to students, so the renovations were stopped, and the air handlers were left unfixed.

"A small dent was made in the $40 million worth of needs," Pitts said.

The members of the committee passed a motion to allow an expenditure from the replacement and repairs account toward mechanical repairs.

In addition, Pitts talked about needing upgrades in the lighting and sound systems in the Grand Ballroom and Forum Hall in the Union.

"At this point, we're seeking funds to pay for equipment to pay for the two rooms," he said.

However, the Union is in negotiations with Starbucks to change to a corporate store in the Union, he said.

Due to financial decisions that depend on the agreement with Starbucks, members will wait to decide on the equipment upgrades for the rooms.

Matt Wagner, chair of the committee, said the utilities issue was more of a central administrative issue and would need to be worked out there.

Bergin, director of SafeRide, discussed financial changes that need to be made, like an increase in the emergency allocations and a funding increase for next year.

Bergin said there has been an increase in rides per night given by the program, which has been more efficient with its trips, especially with the new Aggieville pick-up station.

Bryan Cox, committee member, suggested doing a thorough study of the program due to different problems with it.

However, Gayle Spencer, adviser of Student Governing Association, said studies have been done in years past, and no other viable alternatives have been found to operate the system.

Spencer said city commissioners have not supported SafeRide because minors who have been drinking use it.

Bergin said the university's SafeRide program seems to work better than programs at other Big 12 universities.

"When you look at our program in comparison to other schools, our program is more appealing to students," he said.

Salsa dancers draw large crowd

By Kristen Roderick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Samantha Fennema has been salsa dancing for three years, and she has never been nervous – until Monday.

Fennema, junior in Spanish, and other members of K-State's Latin dance club, LatiRitmo, performed salsa, merengue, bachata and other forms of Latin dance at the Festival of Nations on Monday in the K-State Student Union Courtyard.

When people gathered on the second and third floors surrounding the Union Courtyard, Fennema said she became nervous.

"Nobody expected such a large crowd," she said. "When the music started, I forgot about the people and became enthralled with the music."

There was free food available, and others came because they heard loud music in Spanish and saw the members of LatiRitmo dancing.

"It was interesting," Jenny Gleason, sophomore in business, said. "You could tell they've been dancing for a while.

Brad Spencer, sophomore in business, said he enjoyed the presentation.

"You don't get to see that kind of dancing very often," he said.

The event celebrated Hispanic Heritage Month, Sept. 10-Oct. 13.

Fennema said it was a great way to celebrate the month, and the festival allowed members to dance and to promote LatiRitmo.

A.J. Heinen, senior in social science and member of LatiRitmo Dance Group, spins Laura Villalba, instructor of Spanish, at Monday's Festival of Nations celebration of Hispanic culture. The event, which took place in the K-State Student Union Courtyard, was part of Hispanic Heritage Month.

Joslyn Brown
COLLEGIAN

"It's for people who enjoy dancing and want to learn more about the Latin side of it," she said.

The club meets at 9:30 p.m. every Thursday at Silverado Saloon and at 9:30 p.m. Saturdays at Bowinkle's Sports Bar.

Fennema said members practice specific moves together for about an hour and then spend the rest of the night dancing.

Kansans could face mild, wet conditions this winter

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The National Weather Service's Climate Prediction Center has indicated weak El Niño conditions in the Pacific Ocean likely will affect weather in the United States during the remainder of the year and into early 2007.

For Kansas this could mean a mild, wet winter, said Mary Knapp, climatologist for the state of Kansas.

Knapp, who is in charge of the Weather Data Library based in K-State Research and Extension, said while summer 2006 was hot, the month of July was only about two degrees higher than normal. The entire year was one of the warmest in Kansas, though, with the month of January about 20 degrees higher than normal.

Although this winter might be mild, Knapp said that does not mean Kansas will miss out on nippy winter weather. The winter will still bring cold days, but the cold will not be as long or intense.

El Niño conditions, which include climate changes caused from temperature fluctuations in the ocean water, usually bring more precipitation during the wet winter, Knapp said, although the type of precipitation is unsure.

Jim Shroyer, professor of agronomy, said this mild of weather might increase some of the diseases crops experience during the winter months.

"The mild part has me a little concerned," he said. "We usually have more diseases persist into the fall and the winter and start up in the springtime. I like to see a little close to average or a little less. The upside is the moisture, and the downside is the temperature."

Shroyer said last year's winter was dry and warm, contributing to an increased problem in the crops called the wheat streak mosaic, a viral disease. The cold winter months usually slow down this disease, he said. But because of a warm winter last year, it continued to spread, especially in western Kansas.

"There were really pitiful yields," he said.

Mild winters also cause problems for the overall growth of wheat crops.

"In a mild year, the wheat never went dormant, and that's a concern that I have," Shroyer said. "With above-normal temperatures, the wheat gets to be lush, and a rapid drop in temperature can hurt the wheat plants."

Walter Fick, associate professor of agronomy, said native grasslands are not affected much by winter weather, but pastures with smooth brush or tall fescue grass do have a change in growth.

Fick said pastures with smooth brush or tall fescue grass have a longer growing period when the weather remains mild. But Fick said there are no negative repercussions for this extended warmth, just longer growth periods.

With a few years of warmer winters, people might start asking questions about the connection with global warming, but Knapp said the answer to that question is still unknown.

Doing nothing

The world still ignores problems in Sudan, despite calls for action from celebs, politicians

JONAS HOGG

Scenic Darfur, Sudan – land of rape, murder and other unconscionable things humans do each other. What shall we do?

For the past too many years, the Muslim militias in Sudan have waged methodological campaigns of mass rape, torture and genocide against – oddly enough – other Muslims. Before that, they waged methodological campaigns of mass rape, torture and genocide against animists and Christians – those not bound by political correctness might notice a trend.

According to the government of Sudan, the Janjaweed militia is a backward, ramshackle group operating beyond government control. We are left to wonder how a backward, ramshackle group acquired Sudanese attack helicopters, pilots, mechanics and fuel – perhaps they grow wild in Sudan.

Now the socially conscious among us are finding a voice – celebrities, politicians and all others with a vested interest in sounding moral have begun the campaign: do something. Anything. We are witnessing atrocity and sitting by idly.

Yes, we are.

However, it is unfortunate that we have done, and will continue to do, nothing.

The United Nations, on Aug. 31, passed Security Council Resolution 1706, which, ostensibly, called for about 20,000 peacekeepers in the region. Sudan opposes the measure and undoubtedly has since worked to undermine it. This too will not work.

Although movie stars, rock groups and even Kansas' own Sen. Sam Brownback beg, plead with and implore the world to act, the hideousness of world politics and the continued hog-headedness of the United Nations will reduce the possibility of action to virtually zero.

It is a thoroughly beaten dead horse to say U.N. resolutions have neither merit nor strength. Resolution 1706 is, in fact, the 10th resolution to be passed in two years concerning Darfur – one of the provisions actually calls for the enforcement of another resolution passed 18 months ago. Gee, such accomplishments.

We also should keep in mind that the Janjaweed pointedly has refused to sign any of the provisions of the ceasefire agreement, as has its counterpart, the Justice and Equality Movement. The U.N. continues to struggle with the fact that non-state groups (even more so than state groups) do not give a fig about U.N. mandates. As both groups are fed by embargo-busting black-markets, the entire U.N. sanction system has broken down entirely.

Despite the meaningless nature of yet another resolution, the U.N. Security Council was not even able to secure a unanimous vote on an issue that was, by most definitions, a call to end genocide.

Even among those voting for the resolution, reality penetrated thoughts of goodwill.

There were worries about costs, feasibility and timetables. Some countries won't commit until they receive Sudan's approval. The African Union peacekeeping force is poor, underfunded and due to leave.

None of the western countries are anxious to foot the bill in costs or lives lost, and, like many Americans, I find myself dispassionate about involvement in yet another conflict.

Ever present is the hope that the U.N. will get it right, maybe just this once. But this hope is not bright.

It is far more likely group A will tire of slaughtering group B, and perhaps then group B will have a turn to slaughter. Or perhaps both will find a group C to slaughter, or group C will slaughter both groups A and B.

The world presents us with such cheerful options.

Residence-hall life complicated by lack of common courtesy

JOSH ROUSE

So is it just me, or has anybody else come to the conclusion that living in a residence hall is highly overrated?

Oh, sure, it does have a few perks. You don't have to mow your lawn, it's an easy way to make friends, and you will never have to worry about cleaning the toilets.

Sure, this life might be fine and dandy for some. But let's evaluate the situation.

First, if you live in an all-male residence hall, then you surely have realized you have fallen into a trap. I'm not sure what it is about living in a testosterone factory that makes guys go completely nuts, but I'm going to go out on a limb and say it's the lack of estrogen to balance the equation.

When the girls are away, the boys will play. And by play, I mean run down the hall screaming at 3 a.m. I mean play music at volumes equivalent to space shuttles at takeoff. Personally, I don't enjoy being woken up by the sounds of Michael Jackson – accompanied by three drunken guys – singing "Thriller."

But that's just me.

Another situation is the bathroom. I love that the bathroom on the first floor of Marlatt Hall has four bathroom stalls, one of which has been turned into a urinal by the residents before us. What the hell? Did somebody kick in the door and rip off the seat in anger?

Also, why is it whenever I open the door to take a stroll outside, it always smells like somebody was just smoking a stogie? If you're going to smoke, at least walk 5 feet away. There's nothing worse than opening a door and getting a blast of tobacco smoke in your face.

I hope to begin a revolution. I have seen the top of the mountain, and it is good. Let us all be courteous to our hallmates and roommates, and let them sleep. The king of pop can wait until morning.

U.N. must increase penalties to punish North Korea's leaders, not citizens

Kim Jong-il is like a bratty child who throws tantrums in the supermarket when he doesn't get candy. You want to hit him, but he's not yours, so you're powerless. Meanwhile, his mother does nothing but hope he will behave for fear of her empty threats.

As much as you want to be mad at him, it's the parents' lack of control that allows the tantrum to happen.

Just like that child in the supermarket, Kim is not entirely to blame. The United Nations knew North Korea has been improving its nuclear weapons program. The United States tattled on North Korea, and the U.N. gave the country a slap on the wrist. Like a parent trying to halt a childish fight, the U.N. satisfied the United States and gave North Korea a time-out when it should have received a spanking.

The U.N. placed sanctions on North Korea, but those punishments do not affect its leaders. They only are hurting the North Korean citizens who lack the power to change anything.

The U.N. should stop all of its talk and empty threats. This diplomacy isn't working. The U.N. needs to punish severely North Korea's leaders.

It's time the U.N. demands respect from the world, and it won't get it by being a pushover.

We can point the finger and blame Kimmy for being a bad boy, but if the U.N. doesn't do anything, he'll just keep building his slingshots.

Besides, who can be mad at a little "ronery" puppet?

Mojito madness

Easy-to-mix traditional Cuban cocktail makes resurgence in popularity

Art courtesy of the Coca Cola Company

By Matt Sundberg
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

James Bond rarely enjoys an alcoholic drink other than his signature shaken vodka martini, so when he does indulge in a different beverage, people take notice.

In "Die Another Day," Bond lounges by a seaside bar in Havana watching Halle Berry rising out of the ocean in her orange bikini, all while sipping an ice-cold mojito.

The mojito is a traditional Cuban cocktail first made in the 1900s. The drink has become extremely popular over the past few years, perhaps due to it being prominently featured in movies like "Miami Vice," "The Pink Panther" and "Dirty Dancing: Havana Nights."

"In the past two years, the mojito has become an increasingly popular drink, as evidenced by the growth in Internet searches for the drink recipe (a 70 percent increase since 2004) and visits to www.bacardimojito.com (up 400 percent since 2004)," said Ray Crockett, media relations practitioner with the Coca-Cola Company.

In March 2006, the Coca-Cola Company was the first business to bring a national mojito frozen mixer brand to the market with its popular Bacardi Mixers, Crockett said.

Bacardi even went so far as to make its version of the mojito the "Official Cocktail of Miami Vice." Product placement aside, many famous people and celebrities have endorsed the drink; even Ernest Hemingway was rumored to have been a big fan of the drink, reportedly enjoying one or two glasses a day.

Mojitos are a fairly simple drink to make. With only five ingredients – mint, rum, sugar, soda water and lime juice – the drink is refreshing, Manhattan resident Melisa Worthington said.

A few times a month, Worthington said she goes to 4 Olives Wine Bar, the only place in Manhattan she knows that serves the drink, and orders one. 4 Olives' version of the mojito is made with Ron Matusalem Platino Rum (a white Cuban-style rum made in the Dominican Republic), fresh mint leaves, lime juice and a splash of soda water.

"Sometimes you just need something with a good, soothing feeling for a drink," Worthington said. "I enjoy this drink because it's just that. The summer-like feel for the drink also makes me feel good. It's very light."

Because the alcohol is masked quite effectively by the mint and lime, the mojito has emerged as a popular summer drink.

"You shouldn't just stick to it during the summer," Worthington said. "I think it'd be great to share year-round. Sometimes I'll make the drink for my friends at home."

The mojito is similar to the mint julep, a well-liked drink in the South and the official drink of the Kentucky Derby. The julep is made with the same basic ingredients of the mojito, substituting Kentucky bourbon for rum, and served in a small silver cup, instead of the Collins glass used to make a mojito.

While the Midwest, especially Manhattan, might not be considered the best place to find trendy or exotic drinks, those who look hard enough can find a few restaurants that serve them. And if not, maybe they aren't too hard to make at home.

MOJITO

What you'll need:

- ☐ 2 tsp. Sugar
- ☐ 3 Tbsp. Fresh lime juice
- ☐ 1½ oz. Light rum
- ☐ Club soda
- ☐ 3 fresh mint sprigs

What to do:
In a tall thin glass, crush part of the mint with a fork to coat the inside. Add the sugar and lime juice and stir thoroughly. Top with ice. Add rum and mix. Top off with chilled club soda. Add a lemon slice and the remaining mint and serve.

Under the sea goes above expectations with features

"The Little Mermaid: 2-Disc Special Edition"

Grade: A-
DVD review by Annette Lawless

Like any other 5-year-old girl, when the movie "The Little Mermaid" was produced, I couldn't help but dream of a day when I would turn in my legs for a set of fins, red hair and a barely there purple seashell bra.

Times have changed, and so has my overall perspective on the film. When the movie was released last week on DVD, however, I couldn't resist. I had to go back to my childhood.

In the past few years, production companies have vamped up the DVD industry. Walt Disney Pictures has been strong, in particular, among its competitors on the market. In the case of the release of "The Little Mermaid: 2-Disc Special Edition" DVD, this release certainly takes the cake as one of the best DVDs I've seen on the market – and I am a DVD junkie.

Traditional DVD sets include music videos, extended scenes and commentaries, but by the first disc, "The Little Mermaid" already had surpassed expectations.

The first disc includes a new "Kiss The Girl" music video performed by Ashley Tisdale ("High School Musical," "The Suite Life of Zack and Cody"). It also has audio commentary and extended song selections from the film.

The second disc, however, is where the set truly earns the $16.99 I spent at the store this week. There are seven deleted scenes and four interactive games and activities. The final section of the disc allows viewers to explore beyond the story told in the movie. Also, there is a 45-minute backstage pass to the making of "The Little Mermaid."

Other interesting featurettes include insight on the movie's special effects, the story behind Hans Christian Anderson's original tale, presentation reels, animation clips and, of course, the original theatrical trailer.

Outside of the DVD features, one of the biggest upsides to the movie was the quality of the film compared to its VHS counterpart. The colors on the restored project appear more vibrant and bold (at least when not in a really gloomy scene).

The animators also edited parts of the film where they have been criticized before. The most notable scene edited was when the priest's gown moved around his unmentionables – either he had an erection, or he moved his knee.

Never have I seen a DVD push so hard to educate its audience on the true steps to making a successful Disney film. Disney genuinely wants to leave a lasting impression on its audience, and it has effectively done so with this DVD project.

AWARDS

- Academy Awards, USA: Oscar for Best Music, Original Score, Best Music, Original Song
- BMI Film & TV Awards: BMI Film Music Award
- Golden Globes, USA: Golden Globe for Best Original Score - Motion Picture, Best Original Song - Motion Picture
- Golden Screen, Germany: Golden Screen

FAST FACTS

- This film was the most effects-animation heavy Disney animated feature since "Fantasia." The two-minute storm sequence alone took 10 special-effects animators more than a year to finish.
- The directors insisted every one of the millions of bubbles should be hand-drawn, not photocopied. The sheer manpower for such an effort required Disney to farm out most of the bubble-drawing to Pacific Rim Productions, a China-based firm with production facilities in Beijing.
- Ariel's liplines were created with hand-inking.
- Early versions of the videotape had the likeness of a penis on the VHS tape cover. It's the highest tower in the middle of the castle in the background.
- In the opening scene when King Triton arrives at the arena, you can briefly see Mickey Mouse, Goofy and Donald Duck in the crowd of sea-people as mermen when he passes over them.
- This was the first Disney film to receive an Academy Award since "Bedknobs and Broomsticks," though other films had been nominated.
- A few of the backgrounds used during the "Kiss the Girl" scene are taken from "The Rescuers."
- Originally, Sebastian was to have an English accent. It was lyricist/producer Howard Ashman who suggested he be Jamaican. This opened the door to calypso-style numbers like "Under the Sea", which won the Academy Award.

K-State's rugby team competes in age-old sport

Practices are 6:30-8 p.m. on Tuesdays, Wednesdays and Thursdays at Memorial Stadium.

Rugby originated in England in 1823, according to brittanica.com. The story goes that William Webb Ellis, a student at Rugby School in England, was playing a version of soccer with his classmates when he picked up the ball and ran toward the goal. Two decades later, the rules were formally written and a new sport – named for the school – was born.

Over time, rugby has evolved in a number of ways. It has changed internally, but also it has been the inspiration for many new sports, namely American football and Australian football.

For those who have never seen a rugby match, it can be difficult to understand, said Luke Amey, graduate student in architectural engineering and member of K-State's Men's Rugby Football Club.

It has retained many characteristics of soccer, like the length of play and the manner in which substitutions are made. The game is scored much like American football. However, the manner of play differs, Amey said.

One of the biggest differences is the mentality of rugby, said Hale Sloan, senior in biological engineering and K-State rugby team member.

"It's a gentleman's game," Sloan said. "The camaraderie it builds among players on both teams is one of the best things about it."

Today rugby can be found globally. It is still most common in England and Australia but has spread to places like Manhattan. In fact, there has been a rugby team at K-State since 1972.

Since its founding, K-State's rugby team has grown both in size and popularity, said rugby coach Danny Blea.

The current roster includes 35 players, few of whom had rugby experience before college, and the team always takes new players, Blea said.

"The action is the biggest reason (to attend a game)," Blea said.

So far this season, the team has a 3-3 record with four games remaining. The team plays Johnson County Community College at 7:30 p.m. Saturday at Memorial Stadium before finishing the remainder of the season on the road.

"It can be fun (to watch) even if you don't know what's going on, but if you do some homework, it can be even more enjoyable," Sloan said.

K-State sees mood swings based on game outcome

It's amazing how much a difference one game can make in football. The morale of a player, a coach, a team, even an entire fan base can swing with one game faster than in any other sport.

In other sports, teams can move on relatively easily from a win or a loss. But in football, every game is so important that one can change an entire season.

NICK DUNN

A week ago, the K-State football team was in utter turmoil. The Wildcats were fresh off an embarrassing debacle at Baylor. Seniors were benched in favor of players not yet out of their teenage years. Players were kicked out of practice or just quit the team, period.

All around the K-State community, you could see the pessimism and doubt starting to set in. I was guilty of it myself. Coach Ron Prince looked like he had completely lost control of his team and was jumping ship for this season by throwing freshmen out to take their lumps.

Few gave the team a shot against Oklahoma State. Some wondered if the Wildcats would win again this season. An ugly loss to Baylor – the traditional armpit of the Big 12 Conference – obviously can have a huge effect on a team.

But it only takes one game.

All it took was a thrilling show by K-State's newest stars, freshmen Josh Freeman and Leon Patton, to completely change this season's outlook.

Freeman is K-State's new darling, stepping into stardom faster than originally planned. Patton already is drawing comparisons to Darren Sproles – a rather ridiculous assessment, considering Patton has played all of one game. The fact that he is small doesn't mean he has to be Sproles.

After the game, Patton, who is probably less talkative than those new cars that can tell you where to go, was quick to credit the offensive line.

What I saw was Patton making the offensive line look better than it really was. With Patton in the line-up, he had the speed to break huge runs when the line actually did create holes.

What those two people did was offer every K-State fan hope – hope for a season that not too long ago seemed dead.

Prince has gone from clueless to genius. Everyone in the media and every fan was ready to pounce on him last week and not let him up for air.

You've got to give the guy credit. He stuck to his guns and played the youngsters despite many doubts. You could say Prince had the last laugh Saturday, but he wouldn't say so.

"There's no last laugh," he said after the game. "This is just one game in the season. I don't read anything you write, so I don't hold anything against you."

Prince said it best. It was just one game. The game at Baylor dashed hopes completely, but the win on Saturday gave everyone a reason to cheer.

It's hard in football, but you can't overreact to a win or a loss. There's always the next game to be played – and K-State's next game just happens to be against rival Nebraska.

The Huskers are a tough team and will be a huge challenge for the Wildcats. With so much changing from week to week, it makes you wonder, what will the attitude be like around here next week?

Staff Reports

CFB | Patton garners Big 12 special teams player of the week

Leon Patton rushed for 151 yards and set a K-State freshman record with 301 all-purpose yards in Saturday's come-from-behind victory over Oklahoma State. But it was his 95-yard third-quarter kickoff return that earned him recognition from the Big 12 Conference Monday.

Patton, who scored twice in K-State's 31-27 win over the Cowboys, was named the Big 12 Conference special teams player of the week for games on Oct. 7 in voting by a select panel of media that cover the league, conference officials announced.

The freshman from Cedar Hill, Texas, returned his first career kickoff 22 yards during the second quarter. The next time Patton touched the ball on a kickoff, he went the distance.

With K-State trailing 13-10 in the wake of 10 straight Cowboy points, Patton put the Wildcats back on top at the 5:17 mark of the third quarter with a beautiful return that featured patience, a few nifty moves and the raw speed he displayed on the track throughout his prep career.

Patton is the second Wildcat to earn conference player-of-the-week honors this season. Ian Campbell was tapped as the Big 12's defensive player of the week for his efforts in K-State's season-opening victory over Illinois State.

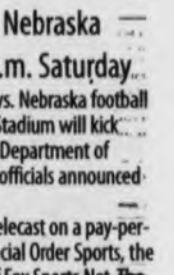
Patton is the first K-State player to earn special teams honors from the Big 12 since Darren Sproles picked up the award for his efforts in the Wildcats' 42-6 win over Kansas on Oct. 25, 2003.

CFB | K-State vs. Nebraska to start at 6:10 p.m. Saturday

Saturday's K-State vs. Nebraska football game at Snyder Family Stadium will kick off at 6:10 p.m., K-State Department of Intercollegiate Athletics officials announced Monday.

The game will be telecast on a pay-per-view basis by Big 12 Special Order Sports, the pay-per-view division of Fox Sports Net. The telecast will be available on cable systems throughout Kansas and Nebraska as well in the Kansas City Metro area.

Suggested retail price for residential purchase is $29.95. A list of cable and satellite providers that have agreed to offer the pay-per-view telecast will be available on k-statesports.com and FOXSports.com (search: Midwest) as it becomes available.



The K-State vs. Nebraska game was bypassed by the Big 12 Conference's television partners for both over-the-air and cable television coverage.

Under Big 12 Conference television guidelines, games not selected for regular television distribution can only be televised on pay-per-view during a conference television window.

CBK | Sutton dismisses freshman for violation of team rules

STILLWATER, Okla. — Oklahoma State basketball coach Sean Sutton dismissed freshman forward Gary Flowers from the team on Oct. 6 for a violation of team rules.

Flowers

A three-paragraph release from Oklahoma State didn't specify what Flowers' violation was, but the 6-foot-8 forward from Dallas has had at least two brushes with the law in recent weeks.

Sutton suspended Flowers, 20, indefinitely Sept. 13 after OSU police arrested Flowers for possession of marijuana. Flowers was charged a day later.

According to Payne County court records, Flowers also was charged Sept. 29 with driving without a license for an offense authorities said occurred Sept. 18.

Court records show Flowers has an Oct. 16 hearing set in both misdemeanor cases.

Sutton said he and his staff decided to dismiss Flowers "based on the best interests of the OSU basketball program. I like Gary as a person, and I hope that he has another opportunity to play college basketball."

Flowers signed with Oklahoma State in November 2005.

TRANSGENDERED | Individuals deal with issues of coming out, past relationships, sexual orientation two vastly different identities.

"I was Debbie, the woman you see here now, and then sometimes I was the man," Davis said. "This man was married, with two kids, paid the bills and had a good relationship. When I came blasting out, I really came blasting out."

Coming out can be a tricky situation, and Davis said the hard part is figuring out who to tell and what to tell them.

She said she told her school administrators what she was, and they tried to come up with a plan of action. Eventually, the secret was leaked, so Davis decided to tell everyone at once.

"I left school on Friday as a man and came back on Monday as a woman," she said. "That man would never exist again, if he ever did exist."

Davis said she was married for 28 years and had two children.

"I was married to my best friend from college," she said. "My partner was actually OK with my being transgendered. But she told me at breakfast one morning that when she was old, she didn't want to be on a cruise in the Bahamas with an old woman – she wanted an old man. After that, we had a quiet divorce."

Davis has had other relationships since then, but she is not clear on her sexual orientation.

"I had an eight-year relationship with a lesbian woman, and after that, I started to develop an interest in men," she said. "For two years, I dated only men. Then I met another woman that I fell madly in love with, and I began to believe that I was only interested in men because it's what I thought I was supposed to do. It's more important what's in your heart and soul than what the body parts are."

Many students said they learned a lot from the speech.

"I came to learn more about the mindset and social aspect of (being transgendered). I definitely did," Jillian Thien, freshman in secondary education, said. "I really enjoyed hearing her speak about her personal experiences, and I thought she gave a very realistic depiction."

Davis said she believes this is who she is, a theme that was echoed in a story about a young girl at her school.

"A young student came to the library counter and stared at me," Davis said. "After a while, she said, 'You're still the same person,' and then added, 'You go, girl.'"

NORTH KOREA | Some call for tough U.N. resolution to limit country's ability to transfer nuclear weapons of missile technology, including transfers to Iran and Syria.

"The transfer of nuclear weapons or material by North Korea to states or nonstate entities would be considered a grave threat to the United States," Bush said in a brief statement in the diplomatic reception room at the White House. "And we would hold North Korea fully accountable for the consequences of such action."

North Korea has been a large security problem for successive U.S. administrations. In 2002, the Bush administration accused the North of reneging on a 1994 nuclear freeze agreement by secretly undertaking a uranium enrichment program. That agreement became inoperative, and in the ensuing months, a defiant North Korea withdrew from the Nuclear Non-Proliferation treaty and ended the nuclear freeze.

In 2003, the United States joined with China, South Korea, Japan and Russia in an effort to negotiate the dismantlement of North Korea's nuclear weapons program in exchange for economic concessions. There have been no negotiations since November 2005 because of what Pyongyang describes as hostile U.S. policies.

Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said a tough U.N. resolution would help protect the United States from the potential spread of nuclear technology and make it harder for North Korea to get the finances needed to fund a nuclear program.

"What the North Koreans have in mind is that if they go ahead and test, we may be angry now, but at some point we'll get over it, and we'll deal with them as a nuclear weapons state," Hill, the chief U.S. envoy to the North Korea nuclear talks, said in an Associated Press Television interview. "We're not going to deal with them as a nuclear weapons state. I don't think China will deal with them. I don't think any of their neighbors will deal with them."

Democrats condemned North Korea's actions and cited the reported test as evidence that Bush's foreign policy strategy is ineffective. They point to six-party talks with the United States, Russia, China, Japan, South Korea and North Korea that have stalled and so far failed to quell North Korea's nuclear ambitions.

The United States has not yet confirmed the test.

"We're leaving it to the scientists," White House press secretary Tony Snow said Monday. "It could take as much as a couple of days. The scientists are still going through all of it."

One U.S. official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the politically sensitive situation with North Korea, said the working assumption among government experts is that, more likely than not, it was a nuclear test. However, various government agencies were still evaluating the data, the official said.

The official said it can't yet be ruled out that conventional explosives could have caused a seismic event of this size.

It could also be that the test – or even one stage of it – failed. In addition, the official said, if the test was conducted in a particularly cavernous area, the shockwave could have been muffled.

Libertarians campaign across Kansas to further awareness of philosophy as alternative stance

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Libertarians Rob Hodgkinson and Patrick Wilbur recently stopped by the Collegian newsroom as part of their statewide campaign tour to discuss some of their stances. Hodgkinson is running for secretary of state, while Wilbur is running for insurance commissioner.

Rob Hodgkinson
SECRETARY OF STATE CANDIDATE

Q: What do you two have to offer the state of Kansas?
Hodgkinson: We are the people's choice. We are not the insiders for Topeka, or Washington, for that matter.
Wilbur: Specific to my campaign, I think I am the only candidate who is offering an actual new solution for the health care crisis. I would see us take a thorough examination of regulations of the state and federal level because they are hurting our small businesses.

Q: When do you think, if ever, the Libertarian Party will be able to contend with the Republican and Democratic parties?
Hodgkinson: That is part of what Patrick and I are doing. Part of what we are doing with our statewide race is to raise the level of awareness about the Libertarian Party. What we are doing with our candidacies is letting people know there is a viable option versus the Republicans and the Democrats. We are trying to make a shift to becoming a real political party. With that, it is like turning an ocean liner; it is not going to happen quick. It is a stepping stone, so we are looking at trying to get double digits statewide. No third party has ever done that. It is a gradual process over several years.
Wilbur: One of the main reasons for traveling is to get our name out there and define ourselves, whether it be Manhattan, Liberal, Garden City. Those people hear about it, and it is potential for not only new members, but for new groups, which is key. What we need to do is go back, and the first step is to get activists in every part of the state, and if we accomplish that in four or five places, and hopefully by next year we should have at least double or triple those organizations across the state.

Q: Do you think a multi-party system would be better for the United States?
Hodgkinson: Absolutely. One of the things I talked about is that we can raise the number of people that turn out to vote if we could make it easier to get on the ballot. Put as many parties as we can (on the ballot). The reason being is then people get interested. Rather than having to vote against somebody, they can vote for somebody.
Wilbur: I think the two-party system could work if we had two parties. If I look at a Republican, especially in this state, or a Democrat, I have no idea what they stand for. Although the Libertarians argue amongst themselves, at least I know that person stands for smaller government and increased power to the individual.

Q: Mr. Hodgkinson, on your Web site, you said you were in favor of legalizing marijuana. Why do you take that stance?
Hodgkinson: I am absolutely for decriminalizing marijuana completely. There is no point to it. Just like alcohol, it can be abused, and there should be laws. If you are out driving drunk and cause a wreck and kill somebody, that is no different than you picking up a gun and killing somebody. You choose to drink, and that is the same with marijuana.
Wilbur: I want to end the war on drugs, period. If that means decriminalization, than let's go for it. All the government does by incarcerating users is turn people into hardened criminals. It gets back to the Libertarian principle to not infringe the people's rights. If somebody wants to smoke pot in their house, that does not harm me.

What are Libertarians, and what do they stand for?

According to the Kansas Libertarian Party brochure, Libertarians, like conservatives, believe government involvement in economic transactions should be minimal. They believe, like liberals, that a person's social life should be free from government interference.

Q: A large political influence in Kansas comes from moral and religious issues. What are your stances on those issues?
Hodgkinson: The Libertarian philosophy is the most moral philosophy because we believe in two things. One is do all you say you are going to do, and the second thing is do not encroach on a person or their property. That sums up the Ten Commandments in the Bible pretty well.
Wilbur: Take, for example, the gay marriage amendment a few years ago. Most Libertarians' stance on that is why is the government involved in marriage at all? If two men or two women want to get married, they can be married in their church or in a ceremony of their choice. Libertarians definitely have no problems with people making their own decisions, as long as they do not harm anybody else.

Intersession is a special time at K-State—parking is easy, and life on campus is extremely pleasant. Intersession is an excellent way to take courses—it allows the student to pursue one course intensively, without interruptions and demands of other coursework or other campus activities. The relaxed atmosphere of the campus is a perfect setting for a highly concentrated course. Classes usually meet for three hours a day, providing time to focus on a subject in depth.

Perhaps the most attractive feature of Intersession is the opportunity for students to concentrate on one course at a time while earning extra credits to accelerate their programs. Both students and faculty find Intersession to be a rewarding experience.

Intersession offers courses of 1 to 3 credits each from a variety of departments and colleges. Tuition and registration procedures are explained in this brochure and on the web at www.dce.ksu.edu/intersession. Questions about specific course content or requirements should be addressed to individual instructors. If this publication doesn't answer all your questions, please call the Division of Continuing Education at (785) 532-5566 (toll-free 1-800-432-8222).

Registration

Intersession is open to K-State students and to the public. Prior pre-enrollment at K-State is not necessary and registration is a simple one-step process.

Beginning October 23, 2006, students may register for January Intersession courses in one of three ways: any time, from anywhere via the web at www.dce.ksu.edu/intersession; in person at the Division of Continuing Education (DCE), 131 College Court, 1615 Anderson Ave., Manhattan between 8 am and 6 pm; OR, by phone at (785) 532-5566 (toll free: 1-800-432-8222) between 8 am and 6 pm. KATS registration is not possible. Students may request a friend to enroll for them to maximize their chances of getting into their first-choice course. Registrations will be accepted through the first day of class; however, early enrollment is strongly encouraged. Classes are small and enrollments are limited.

No classes will be held on January 1, 2007 due to New Year's Day.

Students planning to use courses toward their degree requirements should check with their advisor to ensure that the Intersession courses selected meet their degree requirements. Also, students must clear any financial delinquencies to the University in order to register for Intersession.

"Go/No Go" Lists

The decisions about which Intersession courses "GO" will be based upon the number of registrations. The "Go/No Go" lists will be posted on our web site—www.dce.ksu.edu/intersession the week of December 4, 2006.

Be Prompt!

Because most classes are small, courses fill quickly. Early enrollment is strongly recommended to secure a place in the class and ensure the course will be a "GO." Although registrations are accepted through the first day of class, delays in student registration could result in courses being canceled. If a student wants to take an Intersession course, it is strongly recommended he/she enroll between October 23–November 24, 2006.

Late Enrollments

A $25.00 late fee will be charged for enrollments received after the first class meeting ends. No enrollments will be accepted after two-thirds of the class meetings have elapsed.

Tuition

On-campus coursework will be assessed at resident/non-resident tuition rates. Off-campus coursework will be assessed at a rate of $224 per undergraduate hour and $305 per graduate hour with no distinction made concerning the student's resident/non-resident status. The on-campus fee structure for coursework administered by the Division of Continuing Education is as follows:

	Resident	Non-resident
Undergraduate per credit hour	$184.50	$509
Graduate per credit hour	$251.50	$582.50

Additional fees may be assessed for courses in the College of Business, Architecture, and Engineering.

Student Fees and Health Fees

Student fees and health fees are collected on a per-day basis at the rate of $1. Fees for on-campus January courses are computed by multiplying the number of days of instruction for the course by the $1 student fee/health fee rate. The fees are not assessed for off-campus instruction or audits.

[Note, not all services offered are open between semesters. Please refer to page 16 of the KSU undergraduate catalog for further fee information.]

Billing

An electronic bill (eBill) detailing your tuition charges will be made available to you on the 15th of each month following your enrollment. Your eBill notification will be sent to your K-State e-mail address. All students must have an electronic ID (eID) in order to receive this e-mail. If you have not yet created your eID, see "eIDs and Passwords" at www.k-state.edu/infotech/welcome/ for instructions. To access e-mail sent to your K-State e-mail account, click on "E-mail" at the website above and read about 'WebMail'. Students may also log in to the KATS website (http://kats.ksu.edu) with their eID to view/update their account and obtain their eBill statement.

Retakes

Undergraduate students may retake courses during Intersession in order to improve their grades. Students must indicate "Retake" on the enrollment form when they register for the courses.

Audit

Students may enroll for audit beginning November 27, 2006 through the first day of class. (See Enrollment Section for details.) Audit fees are calculated at the lowest tuition rate available for a particular course. Thus, if a course is offered for one or two undergraduate or graduate credit hours, the student is assessed the tuition for one undergraduate resident credit hour. No record is made on the academic transcript and no student/health fees are assessed.

Grades

Intersession grades will be averaged into the student's K-State G.P.A. Grades will be available to students on KATS three weeks after the last day of Intersession. The scholastic record of each undergraduate is evaluated twice yearly, at the end of the fall semester and at the end of the spring semester. The student's scholastic status does not change as a result of work taken in Intersession.

Students wishing to sign up for courses on an A-Pass-Fail basis must do so at the time of registration, or before one-third of the class meetings have elapsed.

Status Change

No status changes (i.e., undergraduate to graduate credit) will be accepted after half of the scheduled class meetings have been completed. All requests for status changes must be submitted in writing to the Division of Continuing Education Registration Office.

Incomplete Policy

If an "I" is received during Intersession, and if the student does not make up the "I" before the end of the following regular semester, a grade may be given by the faculty member without further consultation with the student. If, after the end of the semester, the "I" remains on the record, it will be designated as an "F" and will be computed in the student's GPA, weighted at 0 points per credit. The designation of "NR" (no grade reported) will be treated in a like manner.

Canceled Classes

The "GO/NO GO" notice will be posted on our web site—www.dce.ksu.edu/intersession the week of December 4, 2006. Students may also phone 532-5566 for information. Students who enrolled in a canceled class have the option of registering in another class or obtaining a full refund. To officially drop or add a class, students must do so in person at 131 College Court or in writing.

Withdrawals

1) A student may withdraw from a class by written request prior to the completion of one-third of the scheduled class meetings without a grade being recorded on the student's transcript. 2) If a student withdraws after one-third, but before two-thirds of the scheduled class meetings, a grade of W (Withdrawn) will be issued. 3) No withdrawals will be accepted after two-thirds of the scheduled classes have been completed.

Drop/Add Procedure

To drop or add a course, students must submit a drop/add form (or other written notice) to the Registration Office, Division of Continuing Education, 131 College Court. Students who fail to attend class may receive an "F" unless they formally drop the course.

Refunds

All refund requests must be made in person or in writing to the Division Registrar, Division of Continuing Education, 131 College Court.

A 100% tuition refund will be issued if the request is received prior to the completion of 20% of the course, or if the class is canceled. A 50% tuition refund will be issued if received on or before the completion of 25% of the course. No refunds will be issued after 25% of the course is completed or if the course is being audited. No refunds will be issued for lab or material fees collected at registration after the first day of class, unless the course is canceled.

Library

During Intersession, the Hale Library hours of operation vary.

For current hours of operation check the web at www.lib.ksu.edu or call (785) 532-3014.

Credit Hour Limit

The maximum credit hours allowed for Intersession is four (4) hours per student. Anyone wishing to enroll in more than the maximum credit hours must have written approval from his or her academic dean at the time of registration. Students wishing to sign up for courses on an A-Pass-Fail basis must do so at the time of registration, or before one-third of the class meetings have elapsed.

Textbooks

Textbooks (required or recommended) have been ordered for most classes and will be available at Varney's Bookstore at the start of Intersession. Information about textbooks is available from the instructor or from Varney's. Some extra copies may be available at the K-State Union Bookstore. Classes for which textbooks have been ordered are indicated with the letters TB at the end of the course description in this listing.

Using pen, pencil and other media, students will draw from life, from memory, and from their imaginations. We will place special emphasis on drawings which respond to or react to students' previous studio design projects, so that the work of the course can be used to add richness and texture to the student design portfolio.

From Metropolis to the Heartland: Immigrant Experiences in America

SOCIO 500

12/27/06 to 1/10/07

9:00 am–1:00 pm MTWUF

This course focuses on the phenomenon which probably had the largest impact on US History: immigration. Immigrants shape everyday life in the US, and have a profound impact on American society. At the same time, debates on the impact of immigration and possible policy approaches continue to stir emotions, especially in the post-9/11 era, making immigration one of the most contested topics in the contemporary United States. This course uses a sociological approach to investigate the driving forces of immigration. From the perspective of the immigrants, it shows how the emerging global integration increased the volume of international migration, and how did immigrant experiences change over time due to external factors, such as immigration regulations and the public perception of immigration in the US. The goals of this course are:

- to overview the push and pull factors of immigration as well as the operation of migrant networks
- to understand the policy context of immigration
- to investigate the societal responses: exclusion, assimilation, integration and diversity in the American society.

Students, graduates talk about the 1st time they said, "I'm gay"

Story by Jonas Hogg
Photos by Christopher Hanewinckel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Nineteen years ago today, 500,000 people marched in Washington, D.C., to raise awareness of lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender issues.

Since then, Oct. 11 has been celebrated by members of the LGBT community and their allies as National Coming Out Day.

The Human Rights Campaign Foundation has managed the event under the National Coming Out Project since the 1987 rally.

According to the foundation's Web site, this year's theme, "Talk About It," is a continuation of the process that aims to "empower gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender and allied Americans to live openly and honestly about their lives."

As part of the campaign, three homosexual individuals and one lesbian couple have agreed to share their stories with the Collegian.

JASON DOCKINS

Coming out can mark an important life milestone - so important that Jason Dockins, sophomore in women's studies, remembers the exact day – Feb. 16, 2003.

On that day, Dockins went for a ride with an openly lesbian friend and asked her how she came out to her parents. His friend put together the pieces and guessed what he was trying to say – he was gay. That first, literally white-knuckled step, he said, was the hardest.

Things got easier, especially when he approached some old acquaintances who already had suspicions of their own.

"Some of my friends who knew me in high school said I had glitter on my placenta," he said.

The next, and most uncertain step, came in June 2004, when Dockins told his father.

"I actually had an overnight bag ready to go," he said.

After preparing for the worst, Dockins said he and his father hugged, cried and talked about his father's fears that he had failed as a parent and that no one would carry on the family line.

Dockins reassured his father, first, that he had not failed as a parent, and second, that he still, someday, wants children.

The final step in Dockins' coming-out process was stepping down from his position as an Eagle Scout in the Boy Scouts of America.

The Boy Scout's controversial zero tolerance policy has left some former high-ranking members stripped of their positions and banished. But Dockins' diplomatic approach to the situation allowed him to resign peacefully. Some of the senior officials even said if he kept quiet about his sexuality, they would allow him to stay.

But Dockins said his passion for political issues assuredly would place him in the spotlight and decided, instead, to step down.

Dockins said coming out is a personal decision, and each person must come to that decision on his or her own.

"You need to do it on your own terms, not anyone else's," he said. "You know when it's ready."

JOSH REED

When Josh Reed, sophomore in food science, came out to his mother in 2001, the response took him by surprise.

He called her in from the kitchen and told her he was gay. She said OK and went back to cooking.

He sat and wondered if something had gone wrong before asking his mother if she had heard him correctly.

Reed remembered his mother's response as: "Yeah, you told me you were gay - so how many pieces of chicken do you want?"

After dinner he asked, just once more, if everything was all right.

"Josh, you're gay; you're not a serial killer."

Reed said, with few exceptions, everyone he approached when he came out was friendly and supportive.

Although he came out in 2001, he said he felt different long before that.

"(I) knew from about 7 or 8 that I was different," he said. "But the word for that didn't come to me until later."

For Reed, though, the coming-out process has, thankfully, lacked the burdens and difficulties that many face.

Kansas avoids recalled lettuce

By Kristina Monroe
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Vegetarians beware: just weeks after spinach shipments were recalled because of E. coli contamination, lettuce has been recalled for fear of the potentially deadly bacteria.

The Nunes Company of Salinas, Calif., voluntarily issued a recall Sunday of 8,533 cartons of green leaf lettuce. The lettuce was irrigated with water that has tested positive for a generic form of E. coli.

The company has accounted for all but 250 cartons of the recalled lettuce, according to the San Francisco Chronicle.

"Clearly, the company did the right thing in terms of taking a cautious approach," said Dr. David Acheson, chief medical officer for the Center for Food Safety and Applied Nutrition, the branch of the federal Food and Drug Administration that handles food-borne illnesses.

Google buys video-sharing Web site

By Josh Rouse
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Internet search engine Google made history with its recent purchase of YouTube.com, a video-sharing Web site that has made news for several alleged copyright infringements.

Google purchased the Web site Monday for $1.65 billion, the most expensive purchase Google has ever made. With YouTube's average showing of 100 million video clips per day, bloggers and experts alike are speculating whether the increased ad space of YouTube will be worth the money for Google.

Chad Hurley, CEO and co-founder of YouTube, said in a news release he is confident that the new partnership will have many future benefits.

"Our community has played a vital role in changing the way that people consume media, creating a new clip culture," Hurley said in the release. "By joining forces with Google, we can benefit from its global reach and technology leadership to deliver a more comprehensive entertainment experience for our users and to create new opportunities for our partners. I'm confident that with this partnership, we'll have the flexibility and resources needed to pursue our goal of building the next-generation platform for serving media worldwide."

Dave MacFarland, associate professor of electronic media, said he isn't worried about YouTube being compromised or Google making more money. Rather, he thought it was interesting that the large television net-
